GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF ROMANTICISM.
GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF ROMANTICISM.

Romanticism arises out of a fundamental trait in human nature, which always exists, although sometimes it is obscured for long periods by opposing movements, such as classicism and realism. There is always a struggle between the two fundamental traits in human nature, - romanticism and classicism, or heart and head, and sometimes one, sometimes the other gains the ascendancy, generally as a reaction upon the other. Throughout the nineteenth century the world of reality taught us truths and led us to respect the value of facts. Along with this stream of facts there were waves of emotional life thrown up by the large romantic movement, which flourished at the beginning of the century.

It has been said that Romanticism is a return to the Middle Ages, but the definition is incomplete, as there were some elements in the Middle Ages which are lacking in Romanticism for example, asceticism was quite foreign to the general romantic nature; moreover some romanticists had no particular veneration for the Middle Ages. In reality it is the return to that eternal spirit that dwells within us, the presence of which makes itself known and felt from time to time, but always in different forms. Another shorter definition is that Romanticism is the cultivation of the inner life on its emotional side, or "Seelenkultur".

Romanticism is the characteristic expression of the Germanic temperament, and its appearance practically means the victory for the time being, of Germanic thoughts and feelings over those of the Latin races, or Classicism. Since its mission was to free life from the feeling of restraint and to allow the emotions to develop there must inevitably follow what may be called the leading characteristic - individualism. This individualism is also a result of Fichte's "Ich" theory, for the subordination of the exterior world to the mind of man, even although man is to use his powers for higher moral development, gradually caused the deification of the individual. The feature is not only apparent in every disciple of the movement, but also it is one of the chief impulses, which produced most of the other important characteristics which illustrate it and show its development.

This excessive cult of self is one of the causes, which was represented above all by Friedrich Schlegel and Tieck, that of "romantic irony", which was also produced by the joy in the possession of the powers of the Intellect and which led to the ability of looking down upon one’s work from a sort of pinnacle and of being able to laugh at it. This cast a glamour of unreality and almost scepticism upon a large part of the work of the romanticists. It is important to notice that Tieck’s irony is not identical with that of Schlegel, for Schlegel used irony as a critic and reformer, his main purpose being to destroy the faulty art conceptions of his day and to emphasize the fact that one must be lord over one’s own works and deeds, while Tieck used irony as a plaything.

As a necessary result of the cult of the inner life, the romantic writers were interpreters of their feelings; for that end they studied their own personal life and also,—which is important,—their own life as related to the universal. In this study of the relations between man and the universe, the romanticists—in this case following Schleiermacher—were convinced that each individual emotional life has its root in the Divine, and so they wanted to give out what they believed they had found in God’s soul as revealed in Nature. Thus the followers of Schleiermacher began to treat religion, not merely as a series of dogmas, but as a personal matter being closely connected with their own life, and this deepening of religious in an allegory, such as "Heinrich von Ofterdingen" by Novalis, in a fairy tale, such as "Der Runenberg" by Tieck, or in a combination of the two such as "Das Marmorbild" by Eichendorff.

The only means by which the romanticists could express their thoughts about the unknown, so as to connect the inner life with the outer, was by means of symbols. A concrete object was taken as a symbol by giving it an inner meaning, which was sometimes suggested on seeing the object, sometimes fantastically attached for a specific purpose. For example, Nature suggested the idea of God, and was used as the symbol of Divinity; on the other hand, the Blue Flower was given a meaning, the Golden Age. It is important to notice the place of symbolism amongst some of the other characteristics. The gradual tendency towards Roman Catholicism was greatly furthered by the fact that this religion was symbolic. Romantic art was symbolic, so was romantic irony, for a poet did not say all he could have done, also what he did say very often had a hidden meaning. In addition poetic works were the ambassadors to the thoughts of poets and in this way were also symbols. This use of symbols plunged the romanticists further and further into the realm of mysticism, the only realm in which philosophy, poetry and religion can possibly touch, for they felt it their mission to draw into the light that which before had been enveloped in darkness and to reveal the workings of what they called "fate", being earnestly convinced that the lives of men are influenced by supernatural powers. This characteristic of symbolism is particularly developed amongst the later Romanticists.

Closely connected with the love for symbolism was the love and worship of beauty, which gradually became the only aim of the Romanticists, to the detriment of the regard for rules. Thinkers knew that a certain object was beautiful, because their emotions told them so. To them beauty was essentially spiritual, it caused love, which is the force which creates life. These forces of life and love caused the romanticists to have great sympathy with Nature and led them to investigate into the mysterious relations between man and nature and their mutual influences. Fichte, the father of romantic philosophy, in extreme horror of the fashionable cry for Nature departed altogether from it and maintained that there is nothing in Nature which does not already exist in man’s mind. The real and most beloved romantic philosopher was Schelling, who regarded nature and mind as two aspects of the "Weltseele": "Die Natur soll der sichtbare Geist, der Geist die unsichtbare Natur sein", with this difference: that nature is not conscious of its own mind, while man is, his mind developing with that consciousness. It is in this way that Nature became to them the visible sign of the Creator and received a meaning of its own. All Romanticists were agreed upon the fact that every poet must sympathize with Nature and feel the mutual relations between God, man and Nature before he can be truly great. As a result, partly of the love for visible Nature and partly of the search into the unknown, the romanticists always felt a great desire to travel. This longing was always vague in itself, although it brought other sensations with it, such as restlessness and homesickness, a longing for something which was sometimes unattainable, - "Sehnsucht". Eichendorff has written his most beautiful lyrics upon these subjects.

The idea that life is all love and beauty lacked the feeling for social duty, which keeps order and binds a large community together by its mutual duties and obligations. This deficiency was one of the lessons which the study of this period taught later writers. However, this rebellion - against the laws dictated by stern reason for the welfare of mankind - was not so prominent amongst the romantic writers as it was amongst the writers of the Storm and Stress period, since freedom generally in thought and political life had been attained. This characteristic is also marked in other ways. Indeed, it was the tendency to break down the boundaries of national prejudices, to have done with utilitarianism, that caused the reaction against the preceding literary movements and acted as mainsprings to the romantic movement, which stands pre-ominently for freedom and expansion of thought. This desire for freedom from rules is most apparent in the literary productions of the period, all of which are autobiographic. Thus all the works are concerned either with the history of the development of the inner life of an individual or else the development of a thought or a small occurrence; and so only two methods of expression were left to them:—(i) the novel, such as Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister", which is considered as the fountain source of the later works, and Eichendorff's "Ahnung und Gegenwart"; (ii) lyric poems, such as those of Eichendorff and of Novalis. The field of the drama was inevitably closed to them on account of this contempt for rules and also on account of the extreme subjectivism.

The romanticists are generally divided into two groups, the elder and the younger, but only the elder are entitled to the name of romanticists, according to the definition given by the leaders, and it is significant that the greatest writers, who are usually placed under one or the other group cannot be called romanticists according to that definition. The characteristics cited above in general hold good for both groups, although distinctions between the two can be easily made, as usually one side of a characteristic is developed. For example, the elder romanticists were mostly north Germans and being thinkers, not only strived to interpret their art, but also to criticise it. Gradually the scene of action – literally and also mentally, if one opposes south to north as feeling to thought – moved further south, and consequently the younger romanticists developed that particular side which allowed their power of thought to be overwhelmed by their power of feeling. This had inevitable results, for while the elder romanticists were active men of the world as well as writers, the younger romanticists became less active men and more dreamy, their aims and aspirations becoming more and more vague. Nearly all of them had a dislike to following a regular profession; they even lost their powers of criticism and contented themselves with collecting specimens of art, refusing to take an active part in the world around, with the excuse that the world was out of joint and that they themselves were unfitted to be of use under the circumstances. This feature is best illustrated by comparing works of each period. "Heinrich von Ofterdingen" is a man of action, while the hero of Eichendorff's "Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts" is for the most part an aimless wanderer. We have no lasting work from the younger group to com-compare with the translation of Shakespeare and the investigation into foreign languages and literature from the elder, which call forth such praise.

Romantic irony disappeared altogether in the younger Group, for writers such as Arnim and Brentano regarded life much too earnestly and indeed, too tragically; moreover they were not mentally strong enough to be able to laugh at their own work.

As it can be supposed from examinations of these characteristic the very weaknesses and failures of the romanticists had their beginnings in those characteristics, upon which the leaders laid emphasis. For example, Novalis' view of Nature degenerated into a form of pantheism; the use of irony produced artificiality and also insincerity with regard to literary works; the attempt to reconcile ideas which they themselves considered as irreconcilable could not induce conviction. The leaders themselves, moreover, lacked that unknown strength, which moulds thoughts into poetic and durable outward form, besides the force of will which impels men of genius to creative works almost in spite of themselves and as it has been said before, the feeling for social duty never existed, which impels a man forward, very often compensating for the lack of genius. The cultivation of the longings concerning their inner life, which weakened all sense of responsibility and destroyed the idea of leading a good useful life in the world, and the effort to reconcile the irreconcilable, which furthered the use of symbols and ended in vague, unreal mysticism, gradually led the members to enter the Roman Catholic Church, which stifled all freedom of thought and life, and with that also - of necessity - the romantic period.
EICHENDORFF'S IDEAS ON ROMANTICISM.
INTRODUCTION.

INFLUENCES.

In preparation for every poet the ground has to be made ready and the seeds sown. Eichendorff was no exception to this rule, for the influences brought to bear upon him in his early home-life and later on at Halle and Heidelberg were a sort of training for the later poet. Joseph, Freiherr von Eichendorff was born in March 1788, and as his name tells us belonged to a noble family. He gives us a graphic description of the life spent at his home, Lubowitz in his "Tagebuch". As, for example, how his mother told him fairy tales and what joy he took in Nature, studying Zoology with great interest. He also describes his life at school at Breslau, where his mind was entertained by frequent visits to the theatre where the dramas of Goethe and Schiller were acted. In fact everything was ready for the final impulse, which was given at Halle and Heidelberg. He paints with great love the Gibichenstein, close to Halle, and the picturesque situation of Heidelberg, which is "romanticism itself". Influences inside the colleges were not lacking; Steffens at Halle, Gorres, Arnim and Brentano at Heidelberg, together with eager study of the earlier romanticists exercised influences upon his views of romanticism which were never to be blotted out. Thus he grew up in the very atmosphere of the Romantic movement and assimilated its ideas; yet at the same time he stood far enough away from it in his actual life to be able to study the causes, characteristics and the reasons of its failure.

THE CAUSES, DEFINITION, MISSIONS & MASTERS OF ROMANTICISM.

CAUSES OF ROMANTICISM.

Political tendencies.

Eichendorff’s whole life and especially his youth was spent during one of the saddest periods of German history, when the whole of Northern Europe was oppressed by Napoleon, and when an infectious kind of cosmopolitanism was general, which stifled all thoughts of patriotism.

"Es ist hier nach auch sehr begreiflich, dass Hund H. in dieser alles verwischenden Gleichmacherei ohne Nationalität und Geschichte einkömmer Geist, wie Napoleon, den Gedanken einer ganz gleichförmigen europäischen Universalmonarchie fassen konnte."
Görres alone was not misled by this movement and he had an important influence upon his students, especially Arnim, Brentano and Eichendorff.

"Es ist unglaublich, welche Gewalt dieser Mann H über alle Jugend, die irgend geistig mit ihm in Berührung kam, nach allen Richtungen hin ausübte. Und diese geheimnisvolle Gewalt lag lediglich in der Grossartigkeit seines Karakters, in der wahrhaft brennenden Liebe zur Wahrheit und einem unverwüstlichen Freiheitsgefühl, womit er die einmal erkannte Wahrheit gegen offene und verkappte Feinde und falsche Freunde rücksichtslos auf Tod und Leben verteidigte. ——— Wenn Gott noch in unserer Zeit einzelne mit prophetischer Gabe begnadigt, so war Görres ein Prophet, in Bildern denkend und überall auf den höchsten Zinnen der wildbewegten Zeit weis/sagend, mahnend und zärtigend."

The result of this, — although it did not occur until the time of the younger school — was an outburst of patriotism, which, in the case of Eichendorff never died away, and which bore fruit above all in his lyrics.
"Ich möchte am liebsten mein ganzes Sinnen, Letter to Fouqué p. 8 Trachten und Leben, mit allen seinen Bestrebungen, Hoffnungen, Mängeln und Irrtümern, meiner Nation, der es geweiht ist, zu strenger Würdigung und Beratung darlegen".

literary activity. As Germany at that time was not ready to throw off her yoke of slavery, a period of waiting naturally set in, when men turned aside from active life for the time being and gave themselves up to thought.

"Es gibt, meines Bedenkens, keine reichere, Letter to Fouqué p.16 entscheidendere Zeit, als wenn ein tüchtiges Volk im vollen Bewusstsein und Gefühl seiner Kraft plötzlich stillsteht und sich besinnt."

In this manner the ground in Germany was being prepared for the appearance of Romanticism which had never completely died out, retaining a small foothold in the Universities of Halle and Heidelberg.

"Die Universitäten hatten vom Mittelalter Hund H p.410. noch ein gut Stück Romantik ererbt."

During this period of literary activity, thinkers, not finding sufficient and satisfying material in the present, turned their thoughts to the Middle Ages and also to the literature of foreign countries.
"... wohl tut es manchmal not in dieser Zeit, sich in eine schöne Vergangenheit zu versenken".

"Ich flächte mich daher noch immer häufig ins Spanische, mir dann Cervantes und Calderon über manche Sandscholle hinweghelfen".

Reaction.

Another result of this period of thought was a reaction against preceding phases, such as, "Aufklärung" and "Philistertum".

"Der durchgreifende Grundgedanke (vonder Romantik) wardennoch ein kern gesunder: der Gegensatz von Ritter und Philister".

"Dieser alberne und unwürdige Zustand musste endlich den Ernst der Nation zu einer umfassenden Reaction herausfordern. Es musste vor allem Andern, nur erst der innerlich verstümmelte Mensch wieder hergestellt, der einseitigen Aufklärung des überfütterten Verstandes, der sich damals exclusiv der gesunde nannte, musste die verborgene tiefe Nachtseite der menschlichen Seele: Gefühl und Phantasie, erfrischend wieder beigegeben und das sonach erweiterte 16.
und ergänzte Dasein mit der großen Vergangenheit, von der es die Reformation geschieden, von neuem in welthistorischen Zusammenhang gebracht werden".

"Der Geist einer bestimmten Bildungsphase lässt sich nicht aufheben, wie eine Universität (Halle). Was wir vorhin als das Karakteristische jener Periode bezeichnet:

i) Der Geist einer bestimmten Bildungsphase lässt sich nicht aufheben, wie eine Universität (Halle). Was wir vorhin als das Karakteristische jener Periode bezeichnet:

ii) die Opposition der jungen Romantik gegen die alte Prosa war keineswegs auf Halle beschränkt, sondern ging wie ein unsichtbarer Frühlingssturm allmählich wachsend durch ganz Deutschland".

The preceding phase of trying to explain everything by means of reason (Aufklärung) only resulted in confusion, uncertainty and dissatisfaction. Men grew tired of the old denying and questioning spirit of Protestantism and wanted something positive, in which they could believe; hence the longing after those elements, which only the Roman Catholic Church can give.

"Alle Revolutionen der Poesie sind durch die Religion gemacht worden. Noch in der neuester Zeit entstand aus der religiösen Reaction gegen den Unglauben einer flachen Aufklärung die moderne Romantik".
"Der Inhalt der Romantik war wesentlich katholisch, das denkwürdige Zeichen eines fast bewusstlos hervorbrechenden Heinwehs des Protestantismus nach der Kirche".

The stress which he lays upon the fact of Romanticism being the desire after the old Church can be questioned. It is true that there was a tendency towards Roman Catholicism in the School, which was recognised by most of the Romanticists. But this tendency was brought about more by the outward worship, which is customary in that church, and also by the characteristics which it cultivated, such as mysticism, symbolism, rather than by any inward conviction of the truth of its teaching.
Moreover can we not say that Romanticism was the desire after other things as well, such as national unity and fresh knowledge?

In the preceding causes it is easy to see that Eichendorff gives the reasons of his own Romantic tendency, rather than those of the school at large. For example, he lays great stress upon the influence of Görres over the patriotic spirit of his followers, but Görres was not brought into close contact with the leaders, such as the Schlegels. Besides he takes no account of the impulse given by Wackenroder and Tieck and their celebrated walk to Nürmberg.

DEFINITION OF ROMANTICISM.

Eichendorff was essentially romantic, brought up as he was in its very atmosphere, and before he was 20 years old we find him using the word in a connection which immediately strikes the keynote to his romanticism.

"In einem Dorfe wechselten wir schon sehr spät die Pferde und kamen um ein Uhr Nachts in Bränn an, und zwar recht romantisch, indem von allen Fenstern Nachtigallen schlugen, und zwei junge Menschen auf der Strasse schön zur Gitarre sangen".

A little further on we have another example of his use of the word, where we can perceive his romantic aspect of Nature.

"Heute nachmittag gingen wir beide allein, durch Erinnerungen und Clara du Plessis romantisch zum ersten Male zum Wolfsbrunnen. Mit wunderbaren Gefühlen gingen wir über die linken Berge durch Gärten, Sträucher und enge Felsenpfade, mit der immer währ-enden Aussicht auf das liebliche Nekartal unter uns, und die gegenüber stehenden flaunig belaubten Berge, bis sich endlich der Weg senkte, und uns das unbeschreiblich einsame Tal des Wolfsbrunnens in seine ganz eigene magische, dunkle Stille aufnahm".

Romanticism has its root in Christianity, and in the following definition we see its qualifications.

„Diese christliche Poesie ist über-sinnlich, wunderbar, mystisch, symbolisch; und das ist eben der unter-scheidende Karakter des Romantischen".

Besides being peculiar to Christianity, Romanticism is also peculiar to the Germanic temperament, and the following definition gives Eichendorff's conception of Romanticism from a point of view of the word itself.

„Es kann uns im Grunde ziemlich gleichgültig sein, woher wir das Romantische über-kommen haben, es ist jedenfalls ein ganz eigentümlicher, von klassischem Altertum, wie von der nordisch-heidnischen Weltanschauung verschiedener Geist, der vorzüglich in Deutschland Aufnahme und Vertiefung erhalten hat und also wesentlich deutsch ist. Romanisch kann diese Erscheinung, trotz der verführerischen Klangähnlichkeit, sein darum nicht genannt werden, weil grade die romanischen Franzosen und Italiener sich am wenigsten dabei beteiligt haben, dieselbe vielmehr durch germanische Völker, durch die Goten in Italien und Spanien, und durch die Normannen in Frankreich, ins Leben gerufen worden ist. Christlich wäre ohne Zweifel die angemessenste Bezeichnung dafür, wenng sie nicht zu allgemein wäre, derdem wir eine Menge christlicher, ja geistlicher Gedichte besitzen, die nichts weniger als romantisch sind. Wir sehen daher, der Name romantisch mag nun ult oder von den Schlegel's erfunden sein überall keinen vernünftigen Grund, von einer Bezeichnung abzuweichen, die einmal ins Volks/bewusstsein gedrungen, und deren angebliche Unklarheit und Nebelhaftigkeit hier am wenigsten störend ist, daja das Romantische selbst, nachallen Seiten in's Unendliche auslaufend, sich nirgend in feste und bestimmte Begriffsgrenzen einhegen lässt".

In this definition also we see his adverse attitude to everything contained in the word classicism. This is common to most Romanticists, who pointed to the older literature of the Germanic races, instead of to the classic mythology. "Das Marmorbild" of Eichendorff is an allegory in which the poetry, that has its impulse in this classic mythology is a siren, ready to lure any unheedling young poet into her trap.

It is interesting to compare the definition given by Schlegel:

"Romanisch nannte man die neuen aus der Vermischung des Lateinische mit der Sprache der deutschen Eroberer entstandenen Dialekte; daher Romane, diedarin geschriebenen Dichtungen, woherdenn
The difference of definitions is caused by the fact that Eichendorff was essentially a poet, ruled by his inner feelings and faith, with no sympathy for classicism, while Schlegel was essentially a critic, who searched for the causes and meanings of abstract ideas.

THE ROMANTIC MISSION.

Eichendorff lays great stress on the romantic mission, and it is always from this point of view that he criticises. Romanticism has two missions:—

(i) A poetic or aesthetic:

"Die Romantik in dichterischer Beziehung ist nicht bloss in ihren einzelnen Erscheinungen, sondern ihrem innersten Wesen und Principal nach, ganz und gar eine geistliche Poesie".

D.R. p.216.
(ii) A moral or ethical, which is also visible in the first:

"Die Romantik war keine bloss literarische Erscheinung, sie unternahm vielmehr eine innere Regeneration des Gesammtlebens, wie sie Novalis angekündigt hat."

Moreover these two missions are the two chief differences between Romanticism and any other movement.

"Vorzüglich zwei karakteristische Momente, die sie von andern Literatur - Epochen unterscheiden, erstens die Allgemeinheit des geistigen Umschwungs, der nicht etwa, wie in früheren Perioden, die Poesie allein oder wohl gar nur einzelne Gattungen derselben, sondern den ganzen Ideenkreis erfasste; und zweitens das religiöse Grundwesen dieses Umschwungs, welcher eben deshalb ein so totaler sein musste, weil ja die religiösen Gefühle und Überzeugungen überall das geheimnisvolle Senfkorn sind, aus dem die Gesammtbildung einer Nation emportreibt".

Eichendorff lays more stress upon these two missions, perhaps than any other Romanticist. Most of the others took up Romanticists as a sort of party, which allowed them to develop their inner feelings as its privilege. Although, of course, each member was a Romanticist for a certain reason, the mission of the school as a whole could not be clearly seen until after the period.

MASTERS OF ROMANTICISM.

KLOPSTOCK.

Klopstock is the father of modern Romanticism, and not Wieland.

"Klopstock war es, der es jugendlich unternahm und als seine Mission betrachtete, das, was der Unverstand oder die Ermattung der Zeit geschieden, Religion und Poesie wieder zu versöhnen, und wechselseitig durch einander zu beseelen."

"Durch jene masslose Berechtigung des Subjects, der positiven Religion gegenüber, wurde er der Vater der neuern Poesie überhaupt, durch seine Ästetisirung des Christentums der Ahnherr der modernen Romantik".

D.R. p.211.
D.R. p.213.
cp. also
It is obvious that Eichendorff criticised him according to his unorthodox idea of the Romantic Mission and considered Klopstock as the father of Romanticism, because he carried out these two aims.

Eichendorff, like the rest of the Romanticists, acknowledged Shakespeare's influence.

SHAKESPEARE.

"Shakespeare ist und bleibt doch der Meister erfrischend für alle Zeiten".

Eichendorff did not recognize Goethe's importance and influence over the romanticists. He only recognized his genius with regard to

(a) poetry.

GOETHE.

"Heldenhaft aber glücklicher als der haben Gw: Exzellenz über ein halbes Jahrhundert lang den Banner der Poesie über dem Strome einer stürmischen, vielfach bewegten Zeit emporgehalten, und ein neues, unvergängliches Reich deutscher Dichtkunst gegründet, dem wir alle freudig und dankbar angehören".

(b) the novel. As we shall see later, Eichendorff, **op. p.42 took Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister" as the model for novels.† In other respects Eichendorff only saw in Goethe qualities which he disliked, such as:-
(a) lack of patriotism, † p. 170.1.21 D.R.
(b) lack of religious feeling, † p. 178.1.7 D.R.
(c) idealising of visible Nature. † c p. 106

We cannot say that Eichendorff criticised Goethe harshly or gave him characteristics which he did not possess, but we must remember that he had not studied Goethe as thoroughly as his successors studied him, so that he could not have proper recognition of the merits of this great master. Besides that Goethe and Schiller had been Romanticists in their earlier periods, but had separated from them, so that it is not likely that Eichendorff would criticise them as he would have done if they had remained Romanticists.
In considering Eichendorff's ideas concerning the different kinds of poetry, it must always be remembered that every province was regarded as poetry in its most extended sense, also it was mostly from its poetical point of view that he considered the drama or the novel etc. Hence what he says about one province in general holds good for all the others.

There are a few facts to be considered before treating each province separately. Firstly, exterior phenomena such as the introduction of Christianity, the Crusades, the Reformation and also foreign literature, have had a most important influence upon the German literature.

"Es konnte nicht fehlen, soviel Poesie des Lebens musste auch in der Dichtung sich abspiegeln. Es war die germanische Waldnatur mit ihren Abenteuern, mit ihren Elfen, Berggeistern, Nixen, Riesen und Zwergen, wunderbar durch-funkelt von dem frischen Morgenrot, das in die ahnungsvolle Götterdämmerung der altnordischen Mythologie hereingebrochen. Es war dieselbe jugendliche Eroberungslust, die hier die fremden geistigen Elemente, das Althochlatene, und das Orientalische, anstatt von ihnen überwältigt zu werden, sich unterwarf und christlich machte".

"-----das Christentum die Poesie immer mehr vonder äussern Welt nach der innern Welt, vom Realen zu Gemütszuständen, von Handlungen zu Karakteren, mit einem Wort vom plastischen Epos zur idealen Seelenschilderung überführte, welche aber eben das Eigentümliche des modernen Romans bildet, der mit hin wesentlich christlichen Ursprungs ist."

"Die bilderreiche Farbenglut des Orientalischen, D.R. p.7.
womit das Abendland durch die Kreuzzüge in Berührung kam, blieb eigentlich immer nur eine phantastische Arabesko der christlichen Poesie, und hat diese nur mit der lustigen Wunderwelt der Feen dauernd bereichert ------".

Secondly the subject itself is more important than anything else, since it determines whether the method of treatment shall be by drama or by lyric poetry, also since it influences the kind of feeling which is excited.

"Das Gefühl an sich ist nichts, sondern erhält überall Bedeutung und Wundermacht nur durch seinen Gegenstand".

"Die Leidenschaft ist an sich nichts, sondern erhält ihre gute und schlimme Bedeutung nur durch ihren Gegenstand".

Thirdly, the chief mission of the drama, and the novels etc., is to portray the times, and each period has developed its own particular kind, according to the influences exercised upon it and also according to its needs and characteristics. The Spanish literature fulfilled this mission better than any other literature.

"Unter allen ist ohne Zweifel die spanische Poesie die nationalste.——In Spanien ist es die Freude und begeisterte Verherrlichung einer durch Jahrhunderte erkämpften Errungenschaft von Religion, Ehre und Ritter/lichkeit, welche ihr prächtiges, aber durchaus einförmiges Zauberlicht über alle Dichtungen und Dichter wirft".

This point will be considered as we treat of the novel, the drama, the epic and lyric poetry separately.

DEFINITIONS OF POETRY.

As we have seen Eichendorff is a romanticist with regard to its religious and poetical side, so that the consideration of poetry is one of the two most important matters to him.

There is only one kind of true and right poetry:

"----dass es nämlich nur eine wahreund richtige Poesie gebe, stimme ich vollkommen bei".

Poetry is connected with the inward life of a nation.

"Die Poesie ist die Blüte der Gesammtbildung einer Nation".

This definition gives us the connection between the mission of Romanticism and poetry, its method of expression. He expresses this fact in various ways.

"Alle Poesie ist immer nur der Sprecher der Lebens/gesinnungen einer Kultur/periode".

"Was ist Poesie? Nur die indirekte, d. h. sinnliche Darstellung des Eingengen und immer und überall Bedeutenden, welches auch jederzeit das Schöne ist, das verhüllt das Irrische durchschimmert".

By this definition we can see immediately what a religious foundation poetry has in Eichendorff’s estimation.

The elements indispensable for the one true and right poetry are:

i) natural and sincere feelings.

"Fast möchte ich sagen, dass meine ersten Gedichte jener schönen Unschuld, der Seele aller Poesie nicht ermangeln. Meine erste Liebe und lebendige Religion des Lebens wurde bald gestört, indem ich ebenfalls irregereleitet von der herrschenden Idee von Religion, einging in die allerlängste Bestrebungen, Absichten und die Armut der Entschuldigung! Ich wagte nicht mehr, was ich empfand, liebte und dachte unmittelbar an und für sich zu geben, sondern bemühte mich aller ursprünglichen Freiheit unwürdig, meine freien Eingebungen zu Trägern gewisser Ideen zu machen, und nach diesen so lange zu var/allgemeinern, bis sie mir selber und anderen unkenntlich wurden und mein Wesen einmal von dem eigentlichen Leben losgelöst, ohne allen Gehalt und fast sich selber ironisierend nach allen vier Winden hin verduftete.

Ich malte, wie, glaub' ich, Jean Paul sagt, mit Äther in Äther. Ich fahle es nun, dieser einförmige Selbstmord der Poesie muss aufhören, oderich höre auf zu sein".

In this extract we see the results of attempting to force one's tendencies into unnatural channels, where the feelings cannot be sincere. Before all things the sentiments must come straight from the heart. Eichendorff himself was sincere, almost above all other things. This sincerity found expression in his whole-hearted religious faith and is the keynote to his lyricism. Besides that, it was the cause of his lack of Romantic Irony, for it was impossible for him to think lightly of his work.

ii) aspiration and desire and longing. These elements are direct results of the widened boundaries of thought.

"Dieses unendliche Streben, Gott hat es nicht bloss darum in die Brust der Dichter gesenkt, damit sich diese wenigen daran erfreuen, es soll, wie es in lebendiger Freiheit triumphiert, die Welt umarmen, und ihr die Freiheit wiedergeben. Das ist kein Zweck, sondern die Natur der Poesie".
This desire for something unattainable is a characteristic of the romantic school and in many ways the most important element of Eichendorff's lyric poetry. In common with the other romanticists, this vague longing for something took a practical form in the love for wandering, which pervades not only his lyrics but his stories. In the fresh morning air or during the night, but above all in the spring-time, through the woods or on the mountains must his heroes wander, drawn almost irresistibly to the common goal, - Rome. This characteristic is one of the chief motives in the gem of all his stories: "Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts".

iii) beauty. As a result of this endless striving and desire for the unattainable, it follows that the object must not be a well-known or common fact or idea, but rather something which cannot be so easily acquired and which of itself
This cult of beauty, in the sense here, belongs especially to Romantic periods and above all to Eichendorff and the later Romanticists. Outward beauty is necessary at all costs.
iv) fancy, feeling and enthusiasm. These elements must act as impulses to the poet, that the spirit of conception is important.

"In der Poesie kommt es aber überall nicht auf den Stoff, sondern fast aus schliesslich auf den Geist an, mit welchem der Stoff auf/gesessen und gestaltet wird".

"----auch Phantasie und Gefühl, deren Ausdruck eben die Poesie ist".

"Alle Dichtung setzt bekanntlich einige Begeisterung voraus".

"Ohne Gefühl, oder wenn man es so nennen darf: ohne Empfindsamkeit, gibt es freilich begreiflicherweise überhaupt keine Poesie, denn das dichterische Gefühl ist eben die poten-zirte Fähig-keit, das Gross-, Wahre und Schöne zu empfinden".

This idea of the importance of feeling became more and more marked as the Romantic period progressed and was one of the real causes of its downfall. Eichendorff was not so guilty in this respect as some of the others, for he maintained that the idea is just as necessary.
"Dennocly bin ich der Meinung, dass --- beide Elemente, Intelligenz oder Idee und Gefühl unentbehrlich sind".

All these elements, natural and sincere feelings, aspiration and longing, beauty and the necessity of fancy, and enthusiasm show to what school he belonged and also that he adhered to the maxim that a poet must be born and not made.

THE EPIC.

Every kind of poetry has its origin in the saga.

"Alle Poesie nimmt ihren Ursprung aus der Sage".

The saga is according to its nature, objective.

"In der Sage sind aber die produktiven Seelenkräfte eines Volkes, Verstand, Phantasie und Gefühl, alle Blüte künftiger Bildung, wie ein Märchen, noch ungetrennt in einer gemeinsamen Knospe, wunderbar verhälلت und abgeschlossen. Die Sage wird nicht erfunden, sie ist nur der innerliche Reflex der Erlebnisse eines Volkes, ihre Lapidar-

37.
The saga has two developments, one of which is the epic.

"Die Sage --- führt einerseits zur Geschichte und anderseits zum Epos, das noch halb historischist".

But the epos still retains the elements of the saga:

1) There is no distinction between gods and heroes.

"Und gleich wie in der Sage auch die Götter - und die Heldenwelt noch nicht von einander geschieden sind, so wiederholt sich derselbe Organismus auch im Epos; und in dem ältesten nordischen Heldengedichte, in der Edda, erscheint Odin zugleich als Gott, König und Seher".

2) The material is composed of deeds and not of words like lyric poetry.

"Die Lyrik --- geht nicht auf die gewordene Tat, wie das Epos".

3) For that reason, the epic is the poetry of past deeds.

"---das Epos die Poesie der Vergangenheit."
4) The epic is also objective.

"Im Epos geht das Subjektive im Objekt auf."

---Dort verschwindet der Dichter, die Ereignisse sprechen, wie in der Geschichte, für sich selbst".

As it can be supposed from the fact that in the early history of mankind, men were active rather than thoughtful, the epic appeared first.

"Das Epos ist somach überall die frühere Dichtungsart, oder imelhew die poetisch verklärte Sage selbst."

Eichendorff himself has written one or two epics, but in them, although he describes, there is very little real action. The same dreamlike unreal atmosphere lying over them as over all his works.

THE NOVEL.

The novel for Eichendorff as for the rest of the Romanticists was important, since it was one of the two forms in which he expressed his thoughts.

The origin of the novel lies in the epic.
Andere suchten für das gegebene Bild die höhere Bedeutung, und strebten, die halbvernehmbaren Naturlaute und was in der Menschenbrust gleichsam wie in Träumen zu uns spricht, jeden verhüllten Keim des Ewigen, von unten hinauf zu der symbolischen Schönheit emporzuranken, nach der sich Alle sehnen. Diese in der Gegenwart, in der Geschichte und nationalen Erinnerung wurzelnde Richtung ist ihrer Natur nach objektiv plastisch, episch. Aber -- war jene Symbolik eine durchaus christlich, und wir haben bereits gesehen, wie das Christentum die Poesie immer mehr von der äußern Welt nach der innern Welt vom Realen zu Gemäts zuständen, von Handlungen zu Charakteren, mit einem Wort vom plastischen Epos zur idealen Seelen/schilderung überführte, welche aber eben das Eigentümliche des modernen Romans bildet, der mithin wesentlich christlichen Ursprungs ist."

D.R. p.9.

The chief element in the novel is reason.

"Der Roman --- die Welt im Menschen --- deren Motiv ist der eigentliche Gegenstand der Darstellung, Die pragmatische Motivierung aber, diese Naturgeschichte des innern Menschen, ist wesentlich eine Sache des Verstandes, und der Verstand, da es ihm weniger um die Schönheit, als um Deutlichkeit und Klarheit zu tun ist, wählt sich überall die freieste Form des Ausdrucks: die Prosa. Der Roman ist daher die Poesie des Verstandes in ungebundener Rede".

Eichendorff does not carry out his ideas in this respect very well, as in all his novels his chief care is beauty and not reason. It is just this lack of reason which we must criticise, his novels being merely long poems written in poetical prose, The chief motive of the novel is love.

"Vor Allem aber ist es wiederum das Hauptmoment aller Romane, die Liebe, an deren Auffassung und Behandlung sich die religiöse und moralische Herabstimmung am schlagendsten nachweisen lässt."
In his aspect toward the motive of love Eichendorff stands apart from the other Romanticists, for while the others had only two themes: love and beauty, love with Eichendorff had only a secondary place, his chief aim being the description and interpretation of beauty, and above all the beauty of nature.

The so-called moral novels, which have no other end in view, are useless.

"Aestetisch genommen sind diese moralisierenden Tugendromane, wie alle Tendenz / poesie, ganz ohne Werth; aber auch in etischem und religiösem Betracht haben sie wenig genützt und sind sehr bald veraltet."

The history of the novel is important in German literature, since the novel together with the lyric are the only methods of expression which have developed freely.

"In Deutschland ist nur der Roman der einzig zuverlässige poetische Ausdruck der geistigen Zustände. Die selbst in ihren Irrtümern und Torheiten gründliche, grübelnde und mehr beschauliche als handelnde Natur der Deutschen ist recht geeignet für eine Dichtungsart, bei deren dreier Form oder vielmehr Uniform der Dichter, wie auf einem Spaziergange alles nur Erdenkliche -------- gemäßlich in seinem Gedächtniss einfangen kann, Und eben diese bequeme Sichgehenlassen machtden Roman, der überdies neben der Lyrik bei uns am eifrigsten aus-gebildet worden, zu einer wahren Muster-karte aller Gesinnungen und Narrheiten, Abgründe und Untiefen seiner Zeit".
Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister" is the master-piece of the day, since it carries out its mission, - that of portraying a period.

"Das eigentliche Ziel des modernen historischen Romans ist in "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahren" am glücklichsten erreicht, Hier hat Goethe den verhüllten Geist einer denkwürdigen Entwicklung-periode rein und scharf erkannt, und ihn, indem er ihn frei walten lässt, mit allen seinen grossen Bestrebungen und kleinlichen Torheiten durch eine meister-hafte Darstellung für die Nachwelt festzubannen gewusst".

Eichendorff took "Wilhelm Meister" as his model, when he wrote some of his own stories, notably "Ahnung und Gegenwart" and "Dichter und ihre Gesellen". "Ahnung und Gegenwart", which is more important is also a portrayal of the times in which expectation, hope and longing are the characteristics. "Dichter und ihre Gesellen" is a mere imitation, and adds nothing to his fame.

LYRIC POETRY.

The second most important method of expression to Eichendorff, who was above all individualistic, and the one in which he best succeeded, was of course, lyric poetry. Poetry in general portrays the thoughts and deeds of a nation, but lyric poetry is more confined and has a deeper source.

"--die Lyrik --die Geschichte der Seele" G.P.L. i) p.75.

The chief element of lyric poetry is subjectivism, hence it is the poetry of the present.
Die Lyrik ist von aller Poesie die subjektivste, sie geht nicht auf die gewordene Tat, wie das Epos, und nicht auf die werdende Tat, wie das Drama, sondern auf den eigentlichen tieferen Grund von beiden: auf den inneren Menschen; sie hat es mit der Stimmung und nicht mit der äussern Manifestation dieser Stimmung zu tun.—— So ist die Lyrik, da sie an die Individuen gewiesen, wesentlich die Poesie der Gegenwart, und folglich unruhig und wandelbar wie diese; von den Wellen der Zeit erweckt und getragen.—— Sie ist daher auch ihrer Natur nach musikalisch und singbar, und ihr ei/gentliches Organ ist das Lied".

"— hier wird der Dichter zum alleinigen Sprecher, indem er uns nur[den Nachhal giebt, den das Ereignis in seinem Herzen geweckt".

Eichendorff's own lyrics were above all subjective; in them he set forth his sorrows and his joys; hence a kind of sad earnestness pervades his songs.

Since lyric poetry gives expression to the innermost feelings, the ideas on religion and philosophy peculiar to the period must influence it.

"Wenn die Poesie überhaupt mit den religiösen und sittlichen Zuständen der Nation innig zusammenhängt, so muss für deren Temperatur/wechsel grade die Lyrik, als die subjektivste Dichtungsart und Darstellung der Gegenwart, am empfindlichsten sein und sobald dort die Nation an ihrem Innersten ungewiss und irre wird, hier auch zuerst die Verwirrung eintreten".

As a result of the nature of lyric poetry, which portrays the inward thoughts of men, it is one of the last kinds to develop.

"Sie kann nämlich hiernach nirgend den Anfang einer National/poesie bilden, wo vielmehr das Epos liegt.---- Es bedarf schon einer weiter vorgeschrittenen Zivilisation, um das Innerliche künstlich zu verklären."
Lyric poetry flourished in Eichendorff's time, because it was a period of political turmoil, and therefore subjective.

"Diese der subjektiven Zeitrichtung entsprechende Innerlichkeit gibt uns nicht mehr die Dinge wie sie sind, sondern wie sich der Dichter empfindet, geniesst oder erleidet. Daher steht bei uns unter allen Dichtungsarten gerade die subjektivste, die Lyrik, jetzt in der äppigsten Blüte."

THE FOLKSONG.

A peculiar kind of lyric poetry is the folksong, which is developed among the people.

"Die Lyrik, nachdem sie das Rittertum überwunden, ging, ihrem unverwüstlichen Geiste nach, zum Volk."

The people form it and give it its peculiar characteristics and form.

"—keine einzelnen berühmten Dichter;"
die einmal angeschlagene Empfindung, weil sie wahr und natürlich und allgemeinverständlich ist, tönt durch mehrere Generationen fort; jeder Berufene und Angeregte bildet, moduliert und ändert daran, verkürzt oder ergänzt, wie es Lust und Leid in glücklicher Stunde ihm eingebt. So ist das Volkslied, in seiner unausgesetzten lebendigen Fortentwicklung, recht eigentlich das poetisch Signalement der Völkerindividuen, Gleich wie aber Kraft und Ausdruck der Empfindung nicht bei allen Individuen überhaupt derselbe sein kann, so erhält auch das Volkslied bei den verschiedenen Volksständen, je nach ihrer klimatischen und geistigen Struktur, seine besondere Physiognomie und Eigentümlichkeit."

As it can be supposed from the preceding quotation, the folksong is natural to every race.

"Jedenfalls ist er (der Volksgesang) der Grundstock aller nationalen g.) p.166.

48."
Poesie, die in der Naturwahrheit des Volkslieds ihre Wurzel hat".

The folksong possesses the chief element of the lyric poetry: that of reproducing after impressions or thoughts.

"Das Volkslied hat allerding den Grundcharakter aller Lyrik überhaupt; es stellt nicht die Tatsachen, sondern den Eindruck dar, den die vorausgesetzte oder kurz bezeichnete Tatsache auf den Sänger gemacht".

But it is more natural and unaffected by the laws of art than the ordinary lyric poetry.

"Von der Kunstlyrik aber unterscheidet es sich durch das Unmittelbare und scheinbar Unzusammenhängende, womit es die empfundene Empfindung weder erklärt, noch betrachtet oder schilderd ausschmückt, sondern sprunghaft und blitzartig, wie es sie erhalten, wie übergeht, und gleichsam im Fluge plötzlich und ohne Übergang, wo man es am wenigsten gedacht, die wunderbarsten Aussichten eröffnet: Das Volkslied -- Eichendorff himself has written several lyrics which have become popular on account of their similarity to the folksong. Indeed, some of them are even called folksongs, such as "In einem kühlen Grunde".

THE DRAMA.

Most of the Romanticists did not even attempt to write dramas, since the drama demands characteristics, such as objectivism, obedience to rules, to which the writers could not comply.

As is well-known the drama is of religious origin.

\[ \text{"Das Drama ist überall religiösen Ursprungs, und aus dem natürlichen Bedürfnis hervorgegangen, den religiösen Kultus durch Wechselgesänge zu feiern, zu beleben und zu erläutern."} \]

G.P.L. 1) p.82.
The drama, according to its nature, contains the fundamental elements of both lyric and epic poetry.

"Eine solche bloss experimentale und vorbereitende Trennung der beiden ursprünglichen Grundelemente aller Poesie kann aber nirgend von Dauer sein, und strebt unablässig nach Wiederversöhnung, Und diese Vermittelung ist eben das Wesen des Drama's, wo das lyrisch Subjektive, ohne sich selbst aufzugeben, in der darzustellenden Handlung wiederum objektiv wird."

Also the drama is by nature tragic.

"Das Drama ist ferner, seiner Natur nach, ... durchaus tragisch, die versuchte Darstellung des Konfliktes zwischen Subjektivem und Objektivem, des unvergänglichen Kampfes der in der Menschenbrust begründeten Sehnsucht, und Forderung des Ewigen und Unendlichen gegen die begrenzenden Schranken des Endlichen."

As a result of its religious origin and tragic nature, the drama found its expression in the Christian religion.
"Wo aber fände wohl die Poesie in der ganzent Weltgeschichte einen so tief tragischen Stoff, als im christlichen Glauben? --- Es ist bekannt, wie dramatisch bald im Anfange der christliche Gottesdienst sich gestaltete."

Because a higher culture is needed for the drama than for the other kinds of poetry, the drama is always developed last of all.

"Man begreift hiernach leicht, dass schon das bloße Bedürfnis solcher Vermittlung einen höheren Grad, wir möchten nicht sagen menschlicher Bildung, sondern künstlerischer Ausbildung und Reife vorausgesetzt, als jene Vorbereitungszeit. Daher erscheint auch das Drama, gewissermassen Epos und Lyrik in ein Ganzes zusammenfassend, überall zuletzt."

Like the lyricist, the dramatist will be influenced by the religious, moral and political ideas of his time.

"Im allen diesen Verzweigungen aber wird Auffassung und Darstellung notwendig den subjektiven Farbenton des Dichters annahmen und, da der Dichter, er stelle sich wie er wolle, selbst in seinen Idealen, immerdar ein Kind seiner Zeit bleibt, zugleich in dem jedesmaligen besonderen Schliff des Zeitgeistes sich abspiegeln.
Daher giebt das Drama, wo es sich wahrhaft volksmaßig ausgebildet hat, unter allen Dichtungsarten die schärfste Signatur der wechselnden Bildung, Gesinnung und Sitte einer Nation,

Eichendorff lamented the fact, that up till then there was no national drama in Germany.

"Allein in Deutschland besitzen wir heute noch kein nationalem Schauspiel."
The causes are to be found in the phenomena of German history, above all in the Reformation, and in the 30 years War, which separated Germany into two parts, Catholic and Protestant, p. 38 & 39. stifling all feeling for literature. As an argument to the contrary, because Spain still remains united and Catholic, the Spanish drama has developed freely as a national drama.

"...während in Spanien, wo das Katholische Element erhalten blieb, sich ein ganzes
Jahrhundert hindurch um die bieden
Hauptführer Lope de Vega und Calderon zahllose Gruppen fast ebenbürtiger Gefährten bildeten."

As masters of the drama Eichendorff took Shakespeare and Calderon, since they fulfilled the mission of portraying their times.

"Ohne Zweifel wird diese Physiognomie durch das Drama, dessen Hauptaufgabe eben die Karakteristik des Lebens ist, überall am genauesten bezeichnet, wo sich dasselbe irgend naturgemäß entwickelt hat. Calderon versenkt uns in alle Tiefen jener wunderbaren Ritterlichkeit, die sich in Spanien am längsten gegen die moderne Bildung behauptete; Shakespeare ist durch den germanischen Geist Altenglands, der durch seine Schauspiele weht, fast unser Landsmann geworden."

The admiration for Calderon became more intensified as he became older, so that in his "Zur Geschichte des Dramas" even Shakespeare has to take second place.

Besides, as it is obvious from the quotations, he was a great admirer of the drama altogether, and even wrote a few dramas himself, but a dramatic talent had not developed, and although he never gave up his ambition in this respect, his dramas do not add anything to his fame.

Here it is interesting to notice that his best play, "Der letzte Held von Marienburg" was produced at the "Stadttheater" in Breslau in memory of him, but was not a success in spite of the efforts of the actors and actresses.

POETRY AND POLITICS.

Such periods of history as contain war and other political upheavals, are never favourable to literature and especially to poetry. A country must first settle down after its struggles and brilliant achievements, and compose itself to thought; only then will the fine arts flourish. This was the opinion of Eichendorff, who expressed it in various ways.

"Der Lärm der Weltgeschichte muss erst einigermassen wieder vertosn, damit die Klänge echter Poesie, die nicht auf den breiten Flügeln der Politik daherrüdet, hörbar und verständlich werden."

Letter to Dreeves p. 89.
It is natural that every poet should be influenced by politics.

"Kein wahrer Dichter wird von den großsen Bewegungen der Gegenwart im tiefsten Herzen unerschüttert bleiben."

But it is impossible for poets to represent truly the times in which they live, since their view must of necessity be narrow and limited by prejudices.

"Wir alle stehen den Dingen noch allzunah, um sie poetisch aufzufassen, und ruhig gestalten zu können."

Eichendorff laments the fact that people are so taken up by politics in his time that they cannot take interest in poetry.

"Dagegen trübe ich jetzt Vorstudien zu einer ähnlichen Geschichte des deutschen Romans. Ob und wann ich damit zustande komme, weiß Gott. Das Publikum und die Verleger sind jetzt allzu politisch für solche Dinge."

"Wenn die Zeit nur einen großen Gedanken gäbe!"

Letter to Schön p.137.
Eichendorff, like the other Romanticists, was always greatly oppressed by the confusion of the period in which he lived. Like the others, too, he very often wished to give up the battle and stand aside in order to live his life of peace and quietness, and to give himself up to poetry only. This is one of the causes of the extreme longing which pervades his works, finding expression in several ways. He himself expressed the wish, in one of his letters, that he might be able to wander over to America. It is significant that one of his heroes Friedrich, in "Ahnung und Gegenwart" should retire to a convent. Also this dislike of the present and intense longing for something better caused him to create his own atmosphere and to live in his own world. Hence, the important position which the dream holds in all his works. Indeed, we must marvel at the wonderful dreamy atmosphere of these dreams, which, as in ordinary life, generally seem more real than reality.

The results which politics and the restless atmosphere of the times did have upon Eichendorff's ideas will be better understood when we treat of his ideas on individualism.
INDIVIDUALISM.

Individualism is the most striking characteristic of romanticism and is present in every member, not making an exception in this case. According to Eichendorff, everybody has his own life to live, independently of anyone else.

"Es muss doch am Ende ein jeder seinen eigenen ihm gewiesenen Weg gehen, und darf nicht allzuviel nach anderen fragen".

Moreover everybody should allow his character to develop freely.

"Meine einzige Bitte zu Gott ist: lass mich ganz sein, was ich sein kann."

We have already seen what happened if a poet tries to assimilate ideas foreign to his nature, or to develop in a direction which is unnatural to him.

But on the other hand Eichendorff is a man of his time - and bewails the suppression of the individual under the mass.

"Endlich fasste der Strom unserer grossen Zeiten mich selbst und liess mich nicht wieder los."

"Es ist überhaupt auffallend, wie in jetziger Zeit alle Individuen verschwinden; alles ist allein auf die Massen gestellt.
Und doch ist die Masse nur eine Idee, die wie das Königstum, und so weiter, wenig sie wirklich in’s Leben treten soll, individuell, persönlich sein muss."

And sometimes he rebelled against this.

"Man könnte manchmal wirklich verdriesslich werden über den unbequemen Lärm, wenn es nicht eben so sein müsste, wie eine notwendige Naturbegebenheit, wie ein Ungewitter, das die Luft reinigt, wenn es auch zuweilen tüchtig dazwischen hagelt. ---- Von den armen Dichtern hoffen Sie zu viel.
Sie sollen freilich über ihrer Zeit Könige, aber sie sind stehen, wie die auch wie/der recht eigentlich die Kinder ihrer Zeit und Leben von den Eindrücken des Tages. Daher durch die ganze Geschichte die fatale Erscheinung, dass eine grosse Zeit immer grosse Dichter, eine schlechte Zeit immer schlechte oder gar keine Dichter hat.

Letter to Schön, p. 72.
Der Ärger wirkt bloss kritisch, was immer der Tod der Poesie ist,"

But Eichendorff, poet and thinker as he was, saw a better time coming.

"Auch ich glaube, dass wir uns auf den jetzigen Eisenbahnen der Weltordnung, aus der gegenwärtigen Ideenkonfusion glücklich hindurchschlagen werden."

Indeed, it was his earnest wish to be helpful to his country and age; and this fact is important, since it is by no means a general characteristic of the romanticists.

"Gott hat uns ein Vaterland wieder geschenkt, es ist nun an uns, es zu behäten und endlich eine Nation zu werden."

It must be remembered on consideration of his ideas on individualism, which was so crushed by the confusion of the times, that although he shared the annoyance of the other Romanticists at the fact that each individual could not develop as he wished, yet unlike the others, patriotism was an important matter to him. As proofs, he served as a volunteer in the campaigns against the French; also later on in life he did not withdraw himself from public affairs and even wrote a number of essays on political questions.

60.
ROMANTIC IRONY.

A direct result of the excessive individualism of the Romanticists and of Fichte's "Ich" theory was that even the works of an author should be subordinated to him, since they belonged to the exterior world, which is subject to man's mind. It was also influenced by Kant's teaching, for since the Romanticist's conception of Kant's teaching was that it is impossible to distinguish reality from unreality, contempt of the reality became general. All this led to a practice which is now called Romantic Irony.

Eichendorff recognised the uses of this characteristic, yet at the same time he despised the practice of it. He used the word even as early as 1809 in speaking of his own relapse into an artificial and forced way of thinking,

"---bis sie (die Ideen) mir selbst und anderen unkenntlich wurden, und mein Wesen, einmal von dem eigentlichen Leben losgelöst, ohne allen Gehalt und fast sich selber ironisierend, nach allen vier Winden hinterduftete."

This practice of irony has its origin as far back as in the 61.

Völksbücher; for example in Till Eulenspiegel.

"Essind die ersten rohen Lineamente zuer modernen Erscheinung der Ironie und des Humors, die erst später mit den wachsenden Kontrasten ihre volle Macht und Alleinherrschaft in der Poesie erhalten sollten."

Eichendorff’s attitude to irony was the same as that of Schlegel.
Its use was to destroy absurd convictions in the different provinces of thought, for nothing can stand against ridicule.
In this way he identified irony with what he called "Humor".

"Wir aber möchten den Humor viel mehr die natürliche Reaction der noch gesunden Kräfte gegenüber allgemeine Krankheit der Zeit (17. Jahrhundert) nennen".

"Gleichwie das Heiligste durch eine gewisse perfide Ironie ins Lächerliche oder Zweideutige gezogen werden kann, so ist auch das Falsche und Schlechte durch die Aufrichtigkeit eines tieferen dichterischen Gefühls künstlerisch zu bewältigen.
Es gibt überhaupt gegen alle, schlechte Literatur zwei Waffen, die schärfer als blossphoretische oder allegorische Moral in das wilde Fleisch einschneiden.
Eine Poesie der Wahrheit gegen die Poesie der Lüge, welche, vondieser keinerlei Ausgang nehmend, mitten in die Dinge hineinbricht und mit stiller Bildungskraft alle schlummernden Keime weckt, die dann schon von selbst den faulen, schmutzigen Winter überwachsen und unter Grün und Blüten begraben.
Und die zweite ist ein heiteres Spiel mit und über den Dingen, das die aufgeblasenen Narrheiten der Welt zu Tode lacht; denn nichts kann die Lüge, die nur von Eitelkeit lebt, weniger ertragen als lächerlich zu erscheinen vorder Welt. Beiderlei Waffen haben zu ihrer Zeit die Romantik gegen die Mächternheit der damaligen Literatur mit Glück geführt."

Eichendorff had no sympathy with Tieck's conception of irony and considered it as one of the causes of the downfall of Romanticism.
"Tieck ---- kundgegeben durch eine gegen die Sache selbst gerichtete feinzersetzende Ironie, die sich durch alle seine Dichtungen schlingt, und unter dem Vorwand, über den Dingen zu schweben, anmutig spielend mit der einen Hand wiedernimmt, was sie mit der andern gegeben."

At the same time traces of Tieck's conception are apparent, for example in the following quotation.

"Überhaupt ist es im Allgemeinen gewiss ebenso unrichtig als ungerecht, der Dichter mit seiner Dichtung zu identificieren.
Der Dichter mit seiner grössern Erregbarkeit und Empfänglichkeit, umfasst freilich lebendiger als andere Menschen, und gleichsam in einer Art gefährlicher Seelenwanderung, alle Elemente seiner Zeit in sich, aber nicht, um in ihnen aufzugehen, sondern um sie in Schönheit aufgehen zu lassen."

As we have seen, Eichendorff identified irony with humour, and a fact which he did not recognise was that Tieck also 64.

interpreted it as humour. The difference is that Tieck cultivated this tendency too much, so that an air of confusion and scepticism lies over his works, while the practice of irony is by no means one of Eichendorff's characteristics,
The 'new' philosophy was one of the earliest influences which was brought to bear upon Eichendorff. As early as December 1804 - when Eichendorff was 16 years old - he took lessons in the "new" philosophy. This was not merely of trifling importance, for in his diary, January 1807, we read:

"(Wir) besuchten den Herrn Direktor Wentzel, wo wir Gesellschaft fanden und mit dem Prediger Frosch ein Kolloquium über die neue Philosophie hielten."

But perhaps Professor Görres at Heidelberg exercised the greatest influence upon Eichendorff's ideas in this respect. In the programme given in October 1807 he says:

"Von 7-8 Philosophie bei Prof: Görres, 4 mal wöchentlich".

That Eichendorff studied Kant, Fichte and Schelling industriously, we gather from his literary works. In Kant he only saw a thinker with the denying spirit of Protestantism, doing his best to replace religion by mere morality.

"Kant war der eigentliche Philosoph der Reformation, indem er die einmal emanzipirte menschliche Vernunft nun auch ganz folgerecht zum waltenden Prinziperob"

In his work he has above all:

"--- die philosophische Arbeit seiner Vorgänger streng geordnet und da er dieselbe in seiner grossartigen Wahrheitsliebe für das Ganze als unzureichend erkannte, die Welt lieber sogleich in zwei Provinzen geteilt: in die durch menschliche Erfahrung wahrnehmbare, die er sich glorreich erobert, und in die terra incognita des Unsichtbaren, die er mit der für dem Genie eigenen heiligen Scheu auf sich beruhen liess"

This aspect of the world affected his religious aspect.

"---er tolerirte jenseits ein geheimnisvolles Gebiet, in das die Vernunft nicht einzudringen vermag; die Vernunft soll daher in dieser Abgeschiedenheit und Resignation sich selbst genügen, sich selber Sittengesetz und Tugend, also im Grunde eine Religion ohne Gott/sein."

Such an advocate of reason could not possibly have any sense of poetry, which is one of the most important factors, according to Eichendorff.
"--- dass er (Kant) von der tieferen Bedeutung der Poesie kaum eine Ahnung hatte, da der dieselbe im Grunde für ein blosses Zerstreuungsmittel hielt."

Yet, on the other hand, it was natural that Kant's philosophy should influence poetry.

Indem diese Lehre die Poeten and her Schwielle des Aller, heiligsten von der Erkenntnis Gottes und der ßberirdischen Dinge zurückwies, verwandelte sie notwendig die Religion ins blossse Moral, welche, so isolirt vom Glauben und dem leben digen Zusammenhang mit den göttlichen Dingen, zu einem abstrakten Tugend - Stoizismus erstarrte. Und diese abstrakte Moral sehen wir denn bei Kosegarten idyllisch schwärmen --- und mit Schiller's Marquis Posa die Bretter betreten --- ."

Kant's philosophy was misunderstood by his immediate followers.

"Seine Schüler wollten klüger sein als der Meister und alles aufklären. -- Sie setzten nun ihren licht seligen Verstand ganz allgemein als alleinigen Weltbeherrrscher ein --- ."
In any case there is no connection between the philosophy of Kant and that of Romanticism.

"---- noch eine ganz besondere Spezies von Philosophen, die den unmöglichen Versuch machte, die Kantsche Lehre ins Romantische zu übersetzen"

It is strange that Eichendorff was so severe against Kant, considering that the enemy of both of them was the same — "die Aufklärung". He seems to have overlooked the fact that Kant, by showing the impotence of reason, cleared the way for the Romanticists, who advocated feeling as the ruler. Yet Eichendorff himself above all is a poet of feeling, in some respects more than the other Romanticists were.

The boundaries of thought, so confined by Kant's theory of reason, were soon broken down by Fichte; with this theory: everything which exists in the world already exists in the mind of man.

"-- bis zur Vergötterung des reformatorisch emanzipirten Subjekts. Die Welt ist nichts, sie existirt nur in der subjektiven Vorstellung, das absolute Ich ist die Welt."
Denk-freiheit geltend machen, er unternahm es wirklich, über den Abgrund, den Lessing auf-getan, hinwegzusetzen, das Prinzip des Protestantismus in seiner ganzen Strenge als souveraines Ich über die Welt, auf die letzten unwirrbaren Gipfel des Idealismus emporzuheben — eine unmögliche Aufgabe."

The fact is curious that, although Fichte was responsible for the excessive individualism by his "Ich" theory, Schlegel was the only one of the Romanticists who acknowledged himself to be his follower, so that Eichendorff in this respect did not stand apart from the majority. It was natural that after the first burst of enthusiasm over the new teaching had died away that thinkers should study it more critically and find out its incompleteness.

Protestantism had gone as far as it could, so that it had SCHELLING, either to cease existing altogether, or to return to its origin. To bring about the latter course was Schelling's mission.

"— indem er das Ideale und Reale als Eins begründete im Absoluten, aus dem das Ich und die reale Welt hervorging, und dass also die Identität von Natur und Geist, oder Gott selber ist."

Thus, not only are there two worlds, the world of nature and the world of man, but also there are mysterious workings in both worlds, the connections between which Schelling attempted to point out.

"--- er andeutete den geheimnisvollen Zusammenhang in den Erscheinungen der Natur, sowie in den Wissenschaften".

Schelling suchte daher, wie schon die Bezeichnung seiner Lehre als „Naturphilosophie" andeutet, das die Natur und Geschichtes verschmähende, unbedingte Wissen mit dem bedingten der äussern Wahrnehmung zu vermitteln, und den geheimnisvollen Goldgrund, den Schimmer Gottes, der alle Erscheinungen durchleuchtet, in wesentlich Platonischer Anschauung nachzuweisen".

The results of this theory upon the aspect of life are:

"Dieser Totalanschauung des Lebens gemäß sind Wissenschaft und Religion Emanationen jenes Absoluten, die Weltgeschichte nur die Selbstentwicklung und Offenbarung desselben, Thus Schelling’s mission was identical with the mission of the Romanticists.

"Der Naturphilosophie endlich entsprach unsere neuere Romantik. Gleich jener Philosophie (die Naturphilosophie) hat die Romantik aus dem beschränkten Erfahrungsgebiete Kant’s, so wie von der stofflosen Luftspiegelung der Fichte’schen Ichheit, kühner wie beide, wieder zu der innern Wahrnehmung des Übersinnlichen und der in der äussern Welt waltenden ewigen Naturkraft sich zurückgewendet."

In thus praising Schelling, Eichendorff differed in no way from the others, all the Romanticists being enthusiastic admirers of this philosopher.

Eichendorff was always very severe against the so-called "schoolroom" philosophy, the reaction against which he considered to be one of the causes of romanticism. Kant’s followers wanted to be more clever than their master and tried to explain everything; hence the schoolroom philosophy, in which thinkers merely groped about in the dark. But the romanticists considered Kant's teaching to be this: we cannot explain anything with our reason, and so we must look for other means. It was this search for other means which comprised the philosophy of the romanticists, most of them considering the keynote to be religion, or rather religious feeling. Eichendorff saw this point clearly.

"Bisher suchten die Literarhistoriker die ganze Bildung "ängstlich vor aller positiven Religion abzusperren, daher die bei aller philosophischen Aufgeblasenheit und poetischen oder vielmehr unpoetischen Überschwenglichkeit entsetzlich dürren und prosaischen Historien."

As it can be supposed, he had a great contempt for reason.

"Es wäre sehr widersinnig anzunehmen, dass für den Menschen überhaupt nichts vorhanden sei, als was der menschliche Verstand begreift."

"Das Übersinnliche und Geheimnisvolle des Lebens ist nirgend Sache des Verstandes."

73.
er betrachtete es mit vornehmen sarcastischen Lächeln, indem er alles Ideale nach der wahrnehmbaren Wirklichkeit, und namentlich die Religion als blosse Moral sich vernünftig zurecht legte."

But this does not mean that he did not see the necessity of reason, which would be absurd. Of course, intelligence is necessary.

"Der Verstand legt zwar den Pfeil auf den Bogen zurecht und richtet und zielt."

Moreover this development of the mind and thinking powers is a sign of the new times.

"Das Streben nach Entwicklung der Geisteskraft ist das unterscheidende Merkmal der neuen Zeiten."

Above all, what is most important in every province of thought if the search for truth, and in the following quotations the influence of the Romantic philosophers upon Eichendorff's mind is clearly seen, since they had demanded freedom of thought, searching for it where it pleased them best, their only aim being satisfaction of their desires in this respect. This search for truth has been above all carried out by the German nation, with two results:

i) cosmopolitanism of thought.

"Ideen lassen sich aber nicht in Provinzen einfangen, und begrenzen, sie sind ein Gemeingut der Menschheit und greifen über die einzelnen Nationen hinaus. Daher hat das deutsche Volk auch, auf Unkosten seines Patriotismus und Nationalgefühls, einen beständigen Zug nach dem Weltbürgertum verspät. Sehr begreiflich; wir wollen die ganze Wahrheit und finden sie natürlicherweise weder bei uns, noch bei unseren Stammesverwandten genügend ausgeprägt, wir greifen daher, wo irgend ein Lichtblick aufleuchtet, in die Vergangenheit, in die Fremde, und lassen diese ebenso bald wieder fallen, wenn wir uns getäuscht, oder noch immer nicht vollkommen befreitigt sehen."

ii) variety of thought.

"Jener Grundzug des deutschen Karakters, die Beschaulichkeit und der Ernst, der uns Alles zu durchforschen und zu prüfen nötigt, bedingt indessen gleichzeitig auch den Trieb, aus der allgemeinen Rundschau immer wieder in uns selbst heimzukehren, das Errungene innerlich zu verarbeiten, und die eigene besondere Natur möglichst eigentümlich auszuprägen."

In looking over these ideas of Eichendorff's upon the subject of Romantic Philosophy we must notice that he had no original ideas on any part of it, yet he had studied it and was greatly influenced by it, even more than he himself recognised.

The complement of philosophy, and above all of mere reason, is religion, by which we are enabled to find the truth.

"Denn alle Philosophie kann sich von ihrer ursprünglichen geheimnisvollen Heimat nicht losagen, und geht, wosie redlich die Wahrheit sucht, stets auf die Lösung der höchsten und letzten Fragen: auf die Religion."

"Alle Philosophie, wosie nicht bloss den Apparat und Schematismus des Denkens gibt, die höhere Versöhnung von Glauben und Wissen zur Aufgabe hat und immerdar haben wird."
In considering Eichendorff's views of religion, we must remember that this was to him the most important factor in his life. (2. Indeed it was that which wielded the bond between him and the romantic movement, for, as we have seen, it was the spiritual side, which attracted him most of all) (His tutor Cinta at Lubowitz, and the school he attended in Breslaw, the teaching of Heinste afterwards, together with his own observations and studies only deepened a characteristic, which was so innate) (2)

He studied with great zeal and insight the religious life of his time, having ample opportunity for this in his work. He saw the different phases, such as that of "Materialism", "Pietismus" and the different results they had upon the minds of people, with this effect:-

"Wenn ich reicher und jüngerwäre, ich wanderte heute nach Amerika aus, nicht aus Feigheit - denn die Zeit kann mir persönlich ebensowenig etwas anhaben als ich ihr - sondern aus unüberwindlichem Ekel an der moralischen Faulnis."

This feeling he shared with most of the other Romanticists, and can be compared with their attitude towards politics.
He had no sympathy with these so-called religions.

"Der Piet-istenspuk, der übrigens auch hier in voller Gift-blüte steht ist, in der Tat empörend und eine wahre Karikatur der alten Ketzer-riecherei. Dieser heutige Pielatismus, dem der Mund beständig von christlicher Liebe über-fliesst, ist eigentlich nichts als die Religion des Hasses."

It is important to notice his attitude to these phases, since it intensified his belief that Romanticism ought to destroy them.

We have already seen what results the introduction of Christianity had in the early and middle ages upon the life, religion and literature of the times, and also that Romanticism has its root in Christianity, but it is necessary to note more particularly Eichendorff's attitude to the Middle Ages to see the causes of his admiration for it. Eichendorff was a true romanticist in his veneration for the Middle Ages. In fact, we cannot exaggerate his admiration for that period, which represented in many ways his ideal. He even speaks of himself as:

"... das sei der letzte Romantiker, der sich vordem Fortschritt der wachsenden Bildung in dem mittel-"alterlichen Urwald geflüchtet".

79.
The Middle Ages represented the youth of the Christian peoples, hence its characteristics were:

"Die Phantasie vorherrschend, eine noch elastische Tatkraft, ein glaubiger Mut, und gewaltiges Wagen und Ringen im Guten und Schlimmen. Wie im Frühling bricht alles in Knospen und Blüten aus, und verbreitet eine wunderbare Schönheit über das Christentum im Mariendienst, in Bauwerken, Schmuck, Künsten."

The ruling principle was fidelity.

"... die Tugend aufopfernder Treue, die bei uns sprichwörtlich geworden und einen wesentlichen Charakterzug des deutschen Mittelalters bildet."

In religious life, people were united by a common bond: the Church.

Moreover, belief, which is the most important factor of religion was then strong.

"Damals war der Glaube noch stark und allgemein". p.138.

Hence we might sum up by saying that Eichendorff saw in the Middle Ages, just those characteristics, especially with regard to religion, which were then lacking at the beginning of the 19th. century. Although he did have, in common with most of the Romanticists, such an admiration for the Middle Ages, it must be confessed that it was more for the ideas, which had been conceived of it, than for the reality. He even says himself that although people are very fond of referring to the good old times, it must not be taken so exactly, since they were only a caricature of the old good times. Neither must we take Eichendorff's veneration for the Middle Ages so literally, since it was only another phase of the Romantic longing and remembrance of what might have been. Thus the Middle Ages were taken as ideal, because they seemed to contain the necessary characteristics, especially from the religious point of view.

A fact, which is particularly striking, is his dislike and misunderstanding of Protestantism. It is necessary to notice this, for in showing up what was to him the negative side of Protestantism and the positive side of Roman Catholicism, he points out the factors in the latter religion which appealed to the Romanticists and which wielded the bond between him and them. This dislike of Protestantism had its root in his misunderstanding of the Reformation. Its spirit was one of denial, causing the faculty of reason to rule over that of fancy, and its ultimate result was the splitting up of Germany inwardly into two parties.

Its chief characteristics were:

"Die durchgreifende Subjektivierung der Religion, das Revolutionäre ihres Verfahrens und ihre Hinneigung zum klassischen Altertum."

We can understand how repellent the contemplation of these characteristics would be to a man, who was a Roman Catholic, and submitted above all to the pope, a conservative and lastly a great lover of the Middle Ages, all of which ideas were, according to Eichendorff, contained in Romanticism.

Eichendorff never looked upon Protestantism in any way, except as a sect, which had fallen away from the church, and in speaking of the church, he always meant Roman Catholicism. And in return for the denying Protestant spirit, the Church offers a positive religion.

D.R. p.142 L 31
This was Eichendorff's favourite qualification on which he laid most stress.

In return for the severe and prosaic outward appearance of Protestantism, the Church offers a religion beautiful in its outward worship, for it is by no means an indifferent matter, whether the outward appearance of a religion, and the way in which one worships is beautiful or not. The proving of this fact or in other words, repairing the harm done by the Reformation was one of the missions of Romanticism.

"Es ist wahrlich eine würdige und segensreiche Aufgabe, unseren zerstreuten Landsleuten auch die tiefssinnige Schönheit unserer Religion vor Augen zu stellen."

Three important elements of Christianity and above all of Roman Catholicism, the cult of which was the aim of the Romantists are: beauty, outwardly and inwardly.

"Es ist daher keineswegs gleichgültig, ob die Religion auch äußerlich schön oder trocken und nüchtern erscheint, denn die Schönheit in ihrer reinen Auffassung ist eben-falls göttlich."

But Eichendorff saw that the dangers of going too far in this particular respect resulted in forgetfulness of truth and loss of belief, which was a cause of the decline of Romanticism.
"Beide (Klopstock und die Romantik) haben weniger die Poesie religiös, als die Religion poetisch gemacht, welche fortan nicht durch ihre Wahrheit, sondern durch ihre Schönheit siegen sollte .......

Dieser Katholizismus der Romantiker war also wesentlich nur eine Ästetische Religion; der Nachdruck ruhte überall auf der Form, die sonach auch naturgemäß sehr bald zur Manier werden musste, wie sie namentlich bei dem letzt genannten Dichter (Fouqué) stehend und wiederlich geworden ist. Wie Klopstock haben daher auch die Romantiker für die Dichtkunst sehr viel, für die Religion aber wenig wahrhaft Ersprässliches gewirkt."

(b) mysticism, since the faculty of reason can explain nothing.

"Der Mensch kann schon sich selbst nicht begreifen, eben weil er durch ihm inne/wohnende unbe/greifliche Kräfte mit dem Geheimnis der Ewigkeit verbunden ist, denn der Verstand vermag nimmermehr die einfache Frage: woher und wohin? zu beantworten. So haben denn auch die Katholiken von jeher die Gottheit als Geheimnis und unsere Beziehung zu ihr, die Religion als etwas Unbegreifliches gefasst."

This mystic side of religion was not cultivated by Eichendorff to the extent it was by Novalis. Eichendorff's mysticism found expression in the mysterious connection between man and nature, man and God, and did not become so complex and unfathomable as that of Novalis.

(c) Poetry. There is an important connection between poetry and religion, for religion is indeed poetic:

"...... die tiefe Poesie unserer Religion"

"Wenn aber die Religion nicht einseitig diese und jene Anlage, sondern den ganzen Menschen, also auch Phantasie und Gefühl, deren Ausdruck eben die Poesie, gleichmäßig in Anspruch nimmt, so ist gar nicht abzusehen, warum der Mensch gerade in seinem Innersten auf jene mächtige Schwinge verzichten, aus dem wunderbaren Instrument, über das der Finger Gottes gleitet, eine Saite herausnehmen und so die ursprünglich vorgesehene Harmonie willkürlich zerstören soll. Diese Bedeutung der Poesie als eines geheimnisvollen Organs zur Wahrnehmung wie zur Mitteilung der göttlichen Dinge, ist auch von jeher von der Kirche anerkannt worden."

Moreover not only is poetry an element of religion, but also in itself it is religious:

"Wo dieses religiöse Gefühl wahrhaft lebendig ist, wird es sich nicht mit müssiger Sehnsucht
It is interesting to notice, while considering the poetry of religion, that although poetry had the secondary place, the elements common to both are connected. For example, beauty is present in both, also aspiration or longing is ultimately connected with mysticism.

Religion imposes various conditions, to which one must submit, but above all the most important factors necessary for the right conception of religion, are:

(a) faith, which is inseparable from love:

"Wie poetisch auch immerdar das Christentum sei, sie musste hier zuletzt auf einen übermenschlichen, positiven Inhalt stossen, der nicht in ihr aufgehen konnte, weil er weder dem Verstande, noch der Phantasie, sondern nur dem Glauben zugänglich ist."

"In der Dichtkunst bekundete sie (die Romantik) diese ihre höhere und durchaus religiöse Weltanschauung: durch die, dem Christentum eigentümliche, versöhnende Liebe, die kein blind-zer-malmer-des Schicksal anerkennt, "

"G.P.L. ii) p.23.

D.R. p.204 L 31
nichts Grosses und Edles diesseits vernichtend abbricht, sondern auch das Tragische naurals ein verklärendes Martyrtum auffasst, Ja selbst in der Behandlung der Liebe im gewöhnlichen, engeren Sinne zeigt sich jenes Streben nach einer höheren Vermittlung des Realen und Idealen."

One of the causes of the decline of Romanticism was the lack of faith in religion; The Romanticiests had plenty of love, but little faith, and one cannot exist without the other.

In the last paragraph also, we read that the Romanticiests did not recognise the place of fate in an individual's life; the contrary view is held to-day, since the conviction, which became more and more intense, of the workings of fate upon the inner life of man, was one of the causes of the leaning towards Roman Catholicism, which promised rest and peace in return for the subjectivity of the individual. This last fact is curious, since Romanticism began by demanding freedom to develop the inner feelings.

(b) practicce. Religion must be brought into the daily life, so that it becomes a real, living thing:

"Sie muss, wenn sie nicht als blosser Begriff in wesenloser Allgemeinheit erstarren solle, in der Eigentümlichkeit jedes besonderen Volkes gleichsam persönlich werden."
We have already had occasion to notice how the Romanticists practised their religion, and seen the results. Perhaps Eichendorff was the only one, who kept his religion pure, simple and constant from beginning to end.

In yielding to the various conditions of religion, one is rewarded by various results.

(a) One can even become holy like the saints in the Middle Ages, if one has faith, the desire to fight against what is evil and the practise of self denial.

"Wie könnten wir in unserer Zeit heilig werden? Ebenfalls durch grossartige Entsagung."

"Die Liebe und Demut ist es, die uns not tut."

Since the religious conviction of the Romanticists was incomplete, some of the promised results were lacking, and this was one of them. Besides, it sounds curious to hear of a Romanticist talk of self-denial, when the chief aim of most of them was self-indulgence. Eichendorff was quite peculiar in this respect and was certainly the only one who practised it. Lastly it is an example of the fact that Eichendorff admired the Middle Ages only on account of his interpretation of that period, rather than from a practical point of view. Can we not say that self denial was practised for example is practised to-day and probably at the beginning of the 19th. century far more than it was in the Middle Ages?
(b) The practise of religion teaches us the various connections between ideas, opposed in themselves, such as earth and heaven, past and present, good and bad.

"Es wäre trostlos, wenn das Dies-seits vom Jenseits durch eine undurchdringliche Schranke, wie zwei ganz fremde Welten geschieden wäre. Das Christentum lehrt vielmehr einen fortwährenden mystischen Zusammenhang zwischen Erde und Himmel, dasselbe lehrt ferner eine jenseitige Vergeltung von Gutem und Bösem, und dass mithin die Vorzüglichsten hienieden jenseits auch eine bevorzugte Stellung einnehmen werden."

"So geht also beständig eine höhere Weltgeschichte der Menschheit, die, ohne sich an Raum und Zeit zu binden, durchaus in grösseren Dimensionen dichtet, indem sie die heilige Bestimmung des Menschengeschlechts im Auge behaltend, die Vergangenheit prophetisch an die Zukunft knüpft, und daher das wechselnde irdische Treiben fortwährend and das geheimnisvolle Jenseits knüpft und daher jenen Evolutionen erst ihre wahre Bedeutung und Stellung gibt."

"... erfüllte mich mit Abscheu, und eine tiefe Entrüstung über die feige Gemeinheit der Welt, die alles Hohe anzuschwärzen strebt. Doch wozu wäre obendrein das Hohe auf der Welt, als um das
This characteristic of attempting to reconcile, what was before considered as irreconcilable, is important, since it was one of the chief aims of the Romanticists, moreover, one which they did not entirely carry out.

(c) As a result of this higher knowledge, morality must follow:

"Sittlichkeit ist keineswegs der Grund, sondern nur erst die natürliche Folge der Religion."

Eichendorff was not blind to the fact, that one of the reproaches made against the Romanticists, was the lack of order in their private lives, but tried to excuse it by maintaining that it was better than the reverse. This remark is important, since lack of order in the private life of the individual Romanticists was a reason of the decline of the School.

(d) As it has been already pointed out, religion is able to answer questions, which philosophy cannot, since philosophy relies only upon the faculty of reason, putting aside those of conviction and faith.

"Was soll ich aber gar erst sagen zu euch, ihr Philosophen? Das ist ein Vornehmtum gegen Gott."
Ihr wollt alles besser wissen. Wie habt ihr's jemals bewiesen? Ihr, die ihr nicht einmal wisst, woher und wohin? Elende Ignoranten!
Der einfachste Mönch mit seinem Köhler glauben ahnt sicherlich mehr vom Drüben und von dem grossen Zusammenhang der Welt als euere Schulweisheit."

This part on Religion is perhaps the most important one, since, the Romanticists set up feeling, and above all religious feeling in the place of reason, which was the ruler during the 18th. century. Also it was the most important factor to Eichendorff, becoming more and more so in later life, when he wrote his critical works; this accounts for the emphasis laid upon its various elements and results here.
"Art" in its wide and general sense was greatly furthered by the Romanticists. Eichendorff also saw its importance, although it was by no means his particular sphere. He describes it as:

"Die Kunst ist ein von Gott bestimmtes Gefäss himmlischer Wahrheiten."

As there is a connection between religion and art, it was an important affair to the Romanticists.

"... der ganze aussere Kultus der Kirche selbst ist ein grosses be-deutungsvolles Kunstwerk."

"Ihre (die Romantik) ursprüngliche Intentionen ... alles Irdische auf ein Höheres, das Diesseits auf ein grösseres Jenseits zu beziehen, mussten daher insbesondere auch das ganze Gebiet der Kunst gleichmässig umfassen und durchdringen."

As a result of this quotation the characteristic of romantic art is the expression of desire.

"Das eigentliche Wesen aller romantischer; Kunst ist das tiefe Gefühl der Wehmut über die Unzulänglichkeit und Vergänglichkeit der irdischen Schönheit und daher eine stets unbefriedigte ahnungs-reiche Sehnsucht und unendliche Perfectibilität."
Although it is a deplorable fact in itself, art was the means by which many of the Romanticists were led back to the Roman Catholic Church.

"Der Einfluss der Romantik auf die religiöse Stimmung der Jugend, indem sie gleichfalls den halbvergessenen Wunderbau der alten Kirche aus seinem Schutte wieder emporzuheben strebte ... Die Romantiker, wenn wir Novalis, Görres und Fr. Schlegel ausnehmen, hätten es nicht um der Religion, sondern um der Kunst willen, für die ihnen der Protestantismus allzu geringe Ausbeute bot".

ART AND POETRY:

The reconciliation and connection of the many different provinces contained in the word "art" was not so exaggerated by Eichendorff, as it was by many other romanticists, although he quite agreed to the fact that there is a connection by means of poetry.

"Ebenso geistreich und scharfsinnig ist es, wie sie auch die bildende Kunst mit in den Kreis der organischen Gliederung ziehen, da ja in der Tat alle Künste in ihrem Grunde Eine Poesie sind."

It is interesting to notice that this idea of poetry lying at the bottom of every art was Schlegel's too.
SYMBOLISM:

Desire or longing is one of the characteristics of poetry, also mysticism is one of the essential elements of Christianity and especially of Roman Catholicism, and as a necessary result of this mystic tendency, thinkers tried to express their thoughts in that direction, but as they had no words with which to translate their thoughts, they had to have recourse to symbolism.

Richendorff looked upon symbolism as that which points out or signifies some idea, but above all in a religious sense.

"Nimmt aber auf diese Weise die Religion nicht bloss den Verstand, sondern den ganzen Menschen in aller wunderbaren Fülle seines Daseins, mithin auch Herz und Einbildungskraft gleichmassig in Anspruch, so führt sie von selbst zur bildlichen Darstellung, zur symbolischen Andeutung durch Künste und "aussere Gebräuche."

"Da aber das Unendliche an sich undarstellbar ist, so musste nun, um es zur poetischen Erscheinung zu bringen, seine Vermittelung mit dem Irdischen durch Symbolik versucht werden. Dies geschah auf zweierlei, einander scheinbar entgegengesetzten Wegen. Die Einen fassten alles Geheimnisvolle, das der Natur und dem Menschenleben einwohnt, in eine allgemeine Welt-symbolik zusammen, und suchten dann von oben herab das Bild dafür in der irdischen Erscheinung als einer blossen Allegorie jener Symbolik. Diese Richtung erreichte in Dante ihren wunderbaren Gipfelpunkt. Andere dagegen, mehr organisch von der Mannig-faltigkeit und dem Einzelnen der bunten Weltanschauung ausgehend, suchten gerade umgekehrt für das gegebene Bild die höhere Bedeutung, und strebten, die halbvernehmbaren Naturlauten und was in der Menschenbrust gleichermaßen wie in Träumen zu uns spricht, jeden verhüllten Keim des Ewigen, von unten hinauf zu der symbolischen Schönheit emporzuranken, nach der sich Alle sehnen."

Poetry can represent what belongs to the earth as a symbol of what belongs to eternity:

"Als aber das Christentum das irdische Dasein in geheimnisvollen Rapport mit dem Jenseits gesetzt und jene zerstreuten Ahnungen, als vorzugsweise berechtigt, in einen leuchtenden Brennpunkt zusammengefasst hatte, so entstand auch sofort eine entsprechende Poesie des Unendlichen, die das Irdische nur als Vorbereitung und Symbol des Ewigen darzustellen suchte."

This characteristic is peculiar to Romanticism.
"Diese christliche Poesie ist daher über-sinnlich, wunderbar, mystisch, symbolisch, und das ist eben der unter-scheidende Karakter des Romantischen."

Above all visible Nature can be used as a symbol of the divine, but we cannot receive the idea of divinity from nature.

"Wir können gewisse durch die Idee Gottes, wenn sie in uns bereits lebendig geworden, die äussere Natur symbolisch beseelen, nicht aber umgekehrt diese Idee von der Natur empfangen."

Symbolism was applied by Eichendorff to a very large extent. In fact, everything is a symbol. As an example of this "Das Marmorbild" is symbolic, showing us the pitfalls of classicism. In a lesser degree, the moon and night are symbols of the unseen powers, the spring, of promise, even the woods convey to us the idea of being something gloomy and unfathomable.
NATURE:

The direct opposite of art is nature. The feeling for Nature and the consciousness of connections between man and nature has been natural to man from the earliest times, penetrating through every age and through every race down to the present times, each race and each age adding to it its own peculiar impressions and interpretations, either mystic or conventional, or fantastic, but never the same. In the same way each poet adds a little to the fabric and one can liken the process to a piece of embroidery, where the worker, after conceiving the design, takes different threads, some brightly coloured, some more sombre, and after working up the design, gives it out, the old material, but penetrated by the worker's individuality.

In the eyes of most Romanticists, the realm of Nature was something fantastic and extraordinary, and moreover, suggestive of some hidden meaning, their aspect of nature being distinctly influenced by their aspect of art, so that they searched above all for the artistic and the effective. Eichendorff's ideas were a little tinged by this colouring, for his genius lay in attuning human emotions to nature's moods, showing that there is a mystic connection between them. But besides that, he had a great natural love for visible nature itself, apart from any meanings, which it might suggest. Indeed, it is as a poet of nature, unique in his position, that he will be remembered by posterity.

This love for nature showed itself, while he was still a youth, and he wrote his observations down in his "Tagebuck", being especially fond of describing his sundry walks and wanderings. In his "Ahnung und Gegenwart" which is autobiographic, there is a passage, which directly refers to his own childhood:

Seine Seele wandort so ungestört und heiter, dass er die gewöhnlichsten Romane mit jener Andacht und Frischheit der Phantasie ergriff, mit welcher wir in unserer Kindheit solche Sachen lesen. Wer denkt nicht mit Vergnügen daran zurück, wie ihm zu Mute war, als er den ersten Robinson oder Ritterroman las, aus dem ihm das fruhste lüsterne Vorgefühl, die wunderbare Ahnung des ganzen Künftigen reichen Lebens und jeder Buchstabe auf dem Papier anwehte, wie zauberisch da alles aussah/lebendig wurde?
Wenn ihm dann nach vielen Jahren ein solches Buch wieder in die Hand kommt, sucht er begierig die alte Freude wieder auf darin, aber der frische kindische Glanz, der damals das Buch und die ganze Erde überschien, ist verschwunden ........."

As a part of this love for nature was his love for home, which was especially apparent during the early period.
of his life; perhaps we may look upon this characteristic as part of his romantic "Sehnsucht".

"Es war mir so fromm und freudig zu Mute, wie einem lang Verbannten, der seine Heimat betritt und an alles erinnert, was gross und ihm lieb und heilig auf Erden war".

"Die Heimat hat eine eigene Zauberei, die kein Dichter entbehren kann."

Beautiful scenery must always be influential on youth. At Heidelberg, it even deepened the romantic tendency, which was then spreading all over Germany, giving to the movement a colouring peculiarly its own.

"Wie in Heidelberg, der Waldhauch von den Bergen erfrischend durch die Strassen ging, und nachts die Brunnen auf den stillen Plätzen rauschten, und in dem Blütenmeer der Gärten rings die Nachtigallen schlugen, mitten zwischen Burgen und Erinnerungen einer grossen Vergangenheit, da atmete auch der Student freier auf und schämte vor der ernsten Sagewelt sich der kleinlichen Brotjägerei, und der kindischen Brutalität. Wie grossartig im Vergleich mit anderen Studenten—gelungen war namentlich der Heidelberger Kommers, hoch über der Stadt auf der Altane des halbverfallenen Burgschlosses, wenn rings die Täler abendlich versunken, und von dem Schlosse nun der Widerschein der Fackeln die Stadt, den Neckar und die drauf hingleitenden Nachen beleuchtete, die freudigen Burschenlieder dann wie ein Frühlingsgruss durch die träumerische Stille hinzogen und Wald und Neckar wunderbar mitsangen."

In one of Eichendorff's epics "Robert und Guiscard", he celebrates the beauty of Heidelberg and there is a striking similarity between the preceding quotation and the following verses:

"Geblendet sahen zwischen Reben-hügeln,
Sie eine Stadt, von Blüten wie verschneit,
Im klaren Strome träumerisch sich spiegeln,
Aus lichtdurchblitzter Waldes einsamkeit
Hoch über Fluss und Stadt und Weilern Die Trümmer eines alten Schlosses pfeilern.

Und wie sie an das Tönder Stadt gelangen,
Die Brunnen rauschend in den Gassen geln,
Und Hirten ferne von den Bergen sangen,
Und fröhliche Gesell'n beim duft'gen Wehn
Der Gärten rings in wunderlichen Trachten Vor ihrer Liebsten Türen Ständchen brachten.

Der Wald indes rauscht von uralten Sagen,
Und von des Schlosses Zinnen überm Fluss,
Die wie aus andrer Zeit herüberraßen,
Spricht abendlich der Burggeist seinen Gruss,
Die Stadt gesegnend seit viel hundert Jahren
Und Schiff und Schiffer, die vorüberfahren."

Nature, whose characteristic element is mysticism, can only be really understood by a poet, upon whom it has great influence.
"Die Natur ist in ihrem Wesen auch mystisch, als ein verhülltes Ringen nach dem Unsichtbaren über ihr."

"Diese herbstlichen Abschiedslaute der Wandervögel, das Fallen der Blätter, als wollten sie unser Leben begraben, alle das Bängen, Sehnen in die Ferne hinaus und doch wie das heimische Behagen in den wohlgeheizten sichern Stuben, wenn es draussen schneit und stürmt, das alles gehört wesentlich dazu, ein rechtes Dichterherz zu vertiefen und wird auch eigentlich nur von einem rechten Dichterherzen wie das Ihre verstanden."

"Die Welt ist überall schön, wenn man sie mit poetischen Augen anzureihen vermöge."

We have already drawn attention to the fact that mysticism is expressed by the longing in poetry and is an element of religion; here we find that it is also an element of nature.

We can also repeat the process with regard to beauty, since beauty is obviously present in Nature and is also an element of poetry and religion. Thus we may conclude by saying that the two most important elements according to Eichendorff, mysticism and beauty are contained in poetry, religion and nature separately, and not only were these his ideas but they were also the characteristics of his literary works, taking them from the point of view of poetry, religion or nature.

He even limits his proposition further, and not only compares the German "Wesen" with visible Nature, which influences it, but asserts that the true feeling for nature as portrayed in poetry is Germanic only.

"...... so erscheint dagegen das deutsche Wesen als ein weniger glänzendes aber still kräftiges Werden, das vielleicht hienieden niemals vollkommen fertig wird, vielseitig und unendlich wie die Natur, die flüchtige Gegenwart ewig an Vergangenheit und Zukunft anknüpfend. ...... Das deutsche Treiben ist recht wie eine fröhliche Aussicht vom Berge ins Freie, schroffe Felsen, Ströme, Wälder und Saaten in buntm Gemisch bis in die unermessene bleue Ferne hinaus, wo Himmel und Erde einander rätselhaft berühren, jede einzelne Erscheinung, auf welcher der Blick weilt, alas ein Ganzes für sich bestehend, jeder Bach und Strom seine eigene Bahn zum ewigen Meere suchend, alle zusammen doch in einem Farbenton jene blühende Tiefe bildend, welche, wenn sie auch das blöde Auge mit ihrem Reichtum verwirrt, das Herz mit einem unvergänglichen Naturgefühl wunderbar erhebt und erlabt."

"Mit noch grösserem Recht darf man behaupten, dass die ernste und strenge Schönheit unserer Heimat einen ähnlichen Zauber auf ihre Bewohner ausgeübt hat ....... Daher das tiefe Naturgefühl, das in Deutschland alle Wandlungen der Jahrhunderte überlebt hat, und noch bis heute, wie ein erfrischender Windes-hauch, auch unsere Poesie, wenn wir etwa den wesentlich germanischen Shakespeare ausnehmen, von der Poesie aller anderen Nationen unterscheidet".

Of all the poets of nature, Eichendorff himself is perhaps the most essentially Germanic. All his critical and literary works, are pervaded by the same breath, wafted above all from the woods, where the trees and brooks whisper mysteriously, actuated by the knowledge, which was gained in ages long ago, of the fate of mankind. Of all the other romanticists, perhaps, Tieck approaches Eichendorff more nearly in this respect, but Eichendorff's interpretation always maintained the same freshness, while Tieck's became more and more obscurely mystic and wonderful.

As it can be supposed, the French conception of nature, and its influence upon German thinkers could only seem wrong and harmful to an admirer of nature such as Eichendorff was. He even includes Rousseau in his attack, not even acknowledging the latter's wide spread influence, even affecting the "Sturm und Drang" movement, which in its turn affected Romanticism, and the good work he did at the time, in pointing out the beauties of nature as it is, opposed to what man makes of it. But the attitude of these two poets towards nature was different, for while Rousseau loved the mountains, roaring torrents and the sensations, which they produced in him, Eichendorff loved to wander in the woods, where the outlook is smaller and to tell of the mystic connection between nature and man. He devotes several pages to the subject of the French influence:

"Es ist leider hinreichend bekannt, dass wir einst das grosse poetische Pensum, das uns der Himmel aufgegeben, ungeschickterweise vergessen hatten und daher zu gerechter Strafe lange Zeit in der französischen Schule nachsitzten mussten, wo die Muse, sie mochte nun mutwillig odertragisch sein, nur in Schnurkleib und Reifrock erscheinen durfte. Und der abgemessenen Architektonik dieser Schule entspricht denn auch zunächst der feierliche Kurialstil unserer damaligen geradlinigen Ziergärten .... So ungefähr sind uns diese, ganz bezeichnend französisch benannten, Lust und Ziergärten jederzeit vorgekommen. Wir konnten uns dieselben niemals ohne solche Staffage, diese Chloes und galanten Kavalieres, nicht ohne solchen Garten denken ....... Überdies war es Genze im Grunde nichts weniger als national, sondern nur eine Nachahmung der Versailler Gartenpracht; die Nachahmung aber, weil sie denn doch immer etwas Appartes aufweisen will, gerät unfühlig.
On the contrary, gardens ought to be natural.

"...Jeder wahre Garten aber, sagt Tieck irgendwo ganz richtig, ist von seiner eigentümlichen Lage und Umgebung bedingt, er muss ein schönes Individuum sein und kann also nur einmal existieren."

This quotation is important, since Eichendorff's application of his ideas does not fit very well in this respect. In his stories, every garden, whether it is situated in Germany or in Italy, is the same. There are always marble statues which gleam in the moonlight, fallen pillars, mysterious paths, which apparently lead to nowhere, everything in wild confusion, with an air of mysticism, which pervades the whole.

Eichendorff was also equally severe against the pantheistic tendency of romanticism. As it is obvious, to his religious nature, it was sacrilege to confound the servant with the master.

"Wo aber der Glaube und der Sinn für das Übernatürliche aufhört, da fängt der Aberglaube an die Natur an. Man hatte den Meister aus der grossen Werkstatt der Welt hinausgeklügelt, und die Werkstatt der Natur sollte nun für sich allein die Welt bedeuten. Da aber der Mensch sehr bald gewähr wurde, dass er die Spitze, gleichsam das Auge der Natur sei, so konnten es nicht fehlen, dass er sich auch ebenso bald als den eigentlichen Herrn und Gesetzgeber dieser Welt betrachten musste, also erst die Natur und dann sich selbst vergöttterte."

For this reason, Eichendorff criticised almost harshly the aspects of nature peculiar to Goethe.

"Goethe's Poesie war und blieb eine Naturpoesie im höheren Sinne .... Sie gibt Alles, was die Natur köstliches geben kann ... aber sie gibt auch nicht mehr. Ihre Harmonie ist ihre Schönheit, die Schönheit ihrer Religion, so wächst sie unbekümmert in steigender Metamorphose bis zur natürlichen Symbolik des Höchsten, vor dem sie scheu verstummt. Die Natur mit ihren mannigfachen Gebilden war ihm die ganze Offenbarung und der Dichter nur der Spiegel dieser Weltseele."
In common with the other romanticists, Eichendorff had a great contempt for mere form and rules with no inner meaning. But at the same time he recognised that various qualities are necessary to make oneself understood, and in this respect he is peculiar, for the others had no regard for form at all, this being one of the reasons why most of the work of the Romanticists is not read now.

The form of poetry and poetry go together.

"Es ist überhaupt ein seltsames Missverständniss die Poesie einer Nation von ihrer eigentümlichen Form, als etwas ganz zufälligem, trennen zu wollen; beide gehören notwendig zueinander wie Leib und Seele, und geben eben zusammen erst die Poesie. Und so ist denn auch der Reim so alt wie die deutsche Dichtung, und hat durch alle Zeiten melodisch forgetönt bis auf den heutigen Tag."

The outward form of poetry is influenced greatly by the nature of that poetry.

"Mit dem Wesen der Poesie musste sich notwendig auch die Form nach und nach verwandeln, die ja selbst hier ein Teil des Wesensist."

But it is not an easy matter to clothe one's thoughts in becoming verse.
"Der Reim ist keine leere/Spielerei oder willkürliche Erfindung, er ist die geheimnisvolle Melodie zum Text, die Musik der Gedanken."

"Die Dichtkunst ist eben eine Kunst, die nirgend im blassen Volksliede erschöpft, und am wenigsten durch die Breite eines vagen Dilettantismus gefordert wird, sondern um zu gedeihen, jederzeit der ernsten Pflege der wenigen vorzüglich Befähigten bedarf."

As for the outward form by itself, something else besides versification is required before it is poetical.

"Aber Metrik ist noch keine Poesie."

But many poets erred in this way, especially at the latter end of Eichendorff's life.

"... ihre (die Poesie) bis aufs höchste gesteigerten Formen machen sie nur den Gebildeter zu gänglich."

This cleverness of fashioning a beautiful form, which became merely superficial and affected, was apparent in some of the later followers of the movement. For example:

"Sie (Thibart und Gries) haben ... jene glückliche Form-fertigkeit erzeugt, deren sich unsere jüngeren Poeten noch bis heute erfreuen."

"Denn wo nun einmal durch die Ungunst der Zeiten der rechte Inhalt abhanden gekommen, tritt notwendig die Form als Hauptsache ein. Und das ist eben Goethe's unübertroffene Meisterschaft, dass er uns in seinen Dichtungen ein edles köstliches Gefäß hinterlassen hat."

"Die allerneueste Poesie, so oft und so herzhaft, ich auch darangegangen, hat mich jedesmal durch das Forcierte und Gemachte wieder abgeschreckt, durch diese fast grandiose Affektation, die um so widerlicher ist, je mehr sie sich dem Schein der Natürlichschaft und Innerlichkeit zu geben sucht."

Eichendorff’s chief regard in his works was a beautiful form and although he adhered to this rule from the first to the last of his works, yet he never degenerated into mere mannerism.

CRITICISM:

It is one of the peculiarities of Eichendorff that, although he is a member of the younger school, he devoted quite a large part of his life, especially towards the latter end, to criticism, in this respect resembling the Schlegels. Besides the three most important works: "Geschichte der poetischen Literatur Deutschlands"; "Der deutsche Roman des 18. Jahrhunderts in seinem Verhältnis zum Christentum", and "Nur Geschichte des Dramas", he also wrote a number of literary essays for different magazines. He saw that criticism is necessary:

"nicht mehr bestehen."

Above all a one-sided negative criticism is useless.

"Alle Kritik ist an sich unfruchtbar, wenn sie sich mit der blossen Negation begnügt".

Poetry can only be criticised by poetry:

"Von Grund aus verjüngt aber wurde die Poesie, und gewann einen über-raschenden Reichtum an Inhalt und Formen. .... Auch hier begannen die Romantiker erst kritisch. Aber ihre Kritik war keine negative Demonstration; nach dem Grundsätze vielmehr; dass Poesie nur durch Poesie recensirt werden könne, ward sie in lebendigem dichterischem Kampfe selber zum Kunstwerk."

Eichendorff recognised that during a period, when literature flourishes, no one thinks of drawing up lists of rules, with the aim of producing beauty artificially, if one does not possess the genius for it naturally.

"Eine poetische Zeit denkt nicht an ihre Schönheit, weil sie dieselbe von selbst besitzt. Erst wenn die Schönheit abhanden gekommen, wird die verlorene absichtlich gesucht oder philosophisch konstruirt, und so entsteht die Ästetik. Wir hatten .... eine ästhetische, d.h. nach den eben gangbaren Schönheitsregeln gemachte Poesie. Aber jeder wahre Dichter hat, meist ohne es zu wissen seine eigene Ästetik."
In his critical works, Eichendorff neither gives us any new ideas nor advocates any method of his own. He merely carries out what he says in the last but one quotation, by putting before us facts, which ought to be well-known to us in a poetical form.

LEADERS OF ROMANTICISM:

Eichendorff had direct connections with most of the leaders. When he was at Halle, he was under the influence of Steffens; at Heidelberg he was on intimate terms with Görres, Arnim and Brentano, and later on in Vienna and Berlin, he frequently visited the Schlegels. In Berlin also he renewed the friendship with Brentano, and attended the lectures given by Fichte. Although he did not meet (i) Novalis or (ii) Tieck, he was their ardent admirer and read their works with great zeal.

As Eichendorff's general ideas on romanticism have been treated, it will be sufficient to note what he admired and blamed in some of the most important leaders besides a few others, of whom his criticism for some reason is peculiar, so as to make clear and to illustrate what we have already said with regard to the different characteristics. He was, moreover, generally consistent in his criticism and application and saw clearly the causes of the failure of the school as well as the reasons of its successes.
Without doubt Eichendorff had the deepest admiration for Novalis, and in this he is not peculiar, since Novalis was greatly admired from the very first. He was the most important, for he represented the school in all its tendencies:

"Fragen wir aber nun nach dem eigentlichen Wesen dieser geistigen Ummwandlung, wie sie damals in der sogenannten romantischen Schule erschien, so müssen wir vorallen Anderen Novalis ins Auge fassen, weil er allein schon die ganze innere Geschichte der modernen Romantik, ihre Wahrheit und ihren Irrtum, in allen ihren Hauptrichtungen darstellt, oder doch andeutet."

Novalis' attitude towards the connection between religion and Romanticism was identical with that of the school in general, and of Eichendorff in particular.

Novalis' purpose in this respect was to be accomplished through poetry, which was of a peculiar kind.

"Naturally, that hereafter poetry is not, for instance, in the subordinated, only aesthetic sense, but in its greatest, all general meaning, that it is, indeed, identified with the meaning of religion."

and the result of this was "Heinrich von Ofterdingen", which is "Poetry itself". Moreover, what is very important:

"Durch seine Dichtungen überhaupt, auch wo sie das Entlegenste berühren, weht der belebende Hauch einer christlichen Weltanschauung ...... so ist Novalis' poetry through and through a prophetic, a poetry of the future and the longing, and his spiritual songs are even through their heartfelt homesickness so imperishable beautiful. Therefore be he him altogether the significance of the dream."

The point which Eichendorff blamed, is the leaning towards Pantheism, which is present, however much Novalis tried to justify himself.
Yet Eichendorff found an excuse for him, by considering his hesitation as "die Zeichen eines rastlosen, treuen Ringens nach der Wahrheit."

On consideration of Novalis' chief characteristics, our attention is drawn by the fact that Eichendorff was very similar to him, for they both had deep faith in their religion as well as feeling for it, and also they both had a great love for Nature, seeing embodied in it the spirit of eternity. The difference between them lay in the treatment and development of these characteristics, for while Novalis' veneration for mystic nature became so heightened that it dimmed his pure religious faith, Eichendorff always kept his religion pure as that of a child, never allowing it to be overshadowed by any other feeling, even for Nature.

Next to Novalis, Eichendorff admired Tieck on account of his deep poetic nature. Tieck is important because:- "Was der gedankenvolle Novalis nur hieroglyphisch angedeutet, hat Tieck mit bewundernswertem Gewandtheit und aller Pracht eines glänzenden Talents in die Poesie wirklich eingeführt. Die Revolution gegen die aufgebläste Weltprosa, die dort/als wissenschaftliche Polemik erscheint, ist .... im gestiefelten Kater .... zum selbstständigen Kunstwerk geworden. Eben so künstlerisch hat er die, bei Novalis fast nur allegorische, Mystik des Naturlebens in das gewöhnliche Menschentreiben zu verflechten gewusst! .... Auch jener Tiefsinn, womit Fr: Schlegel die Einheit der Liebe und der Wissenschaft darzustellen suchte, machte bei Tieck in anderer Weise als Einheit der Liebe und der Kunst sich geltend."

But in the middle of these brilliant characteristics lurked the reasons of not only his failure, but also those of the decline of romanticism. He had above all:

1) A sceptical nature.

(in Tieck's own words) "Ein vorwitziger, kecker Zweifel, ein unermüdliches, finsteres Grübeln hatten für mich den Baum des Lebens entblättert."

ii) a love of outward form without inward conviction, especially with regard to religion.

"Unangenehm überrascht erkennt man also in dieser Umkehr und in der Begeisterung, nicht sowohl die Gewalt religiöser Gefühle und Überzeugungen, als vielmehr das poetische Formen-Bedürfnis eines wähligen Talents, und man erstaunt über die kühle, slanke Fügsamkeit dieses Talents."

iii) From these two characteristics resulted Tieck's conception of irony:

".... die uns überall absichtlich herausführen lässt, dass der Autor an Allesdas, womit er so gestreich spielt, eigentlich doch selber nicht glaube."

Eichendorff was quite right in laying such emphasis upon Tieck's irony, as being one of the causes of the decline of the Romantic School. To-day Tieck's position in the school is due to the fact that he gave some of the first impulses towards the revival of Romanticism, rather than to any admiration which is felt towards his works.

A.W. Schlegel was the "Ästetiker" of Romanticism and his claims for our praise rest chiefly on the following characteristics:

"......... eminente Kritik, vielseitige Gelehrsamkeit, Meisterschaft in den poetischen Formen und vortreff-lliche Übersetzungen."

But these qualities lose their charm and almost influence, when we discover that

"anstatt des ehrlichen Kampfes, den wir voraussetzen und fordern durften, nur ein diplomatisches Scheingefecht, ein verlorenes Leben, das zuletzt genau bei derselben Indifferenz wieder angelangt, gegen die es ein halbes Jahrhundert lang zu kämpfen schien."

Critics to-day are not so severe towards A.W. Schlegel and recognise the fact, that he did a large amount of good work, while Eichendorff only saw his lack of sincerity. Friedrich Schlegel was in reality the chief leader of the movement, his work lying above all in the realm of research:

"mit staunenswerter Vielseitigkeit, Philosophie und Poesie, Geschichte und Kunst, das klassische Alters, wie das Mittelalter und der Orient durch-forschend."

Above all he saw what romanticism needed,

"nicht als literarisches Kunststück zur eigenen Verherrlichung, sondern aus tiefer Sehnsucht nach der höheren Wahrheit" and that was

"Versöhnung von Glauben und Wissen in der Religion."

To achieve this end, Schlegel led the Romantic movement back to its origin, the Roman Catholic Church.

"Aber die Romantik wollte es (das Leben religios machen) bis dahin mehr oder minder durch eine unklare symbolische Umdeutung des Katholizismus."

117.
Schlegel dagegen, erkannte, dass das Werk der Heiligung alles Lebens schon seit länger als einem Jahrtausend, gründlicher und auch schöner, in der alten Kirche still fortwirke, und dass die Romantik nur dann wahr sei und ihre Mission erfüllen könne, wenn sie von der Kirche ihre Weihe und Berechtigung empfange."

On consideration of Eichendorff's criticism of Fr. Schlegel, we must remember that Eichendorff lived on familiar terms with the Schlegels during his stay in Vienna, attended Fr. Schlegel's lectures and so would naturally be influenced by his ideas, with the result that he always criticised him favourably.

Arnim like Novalis and Tieck, was above all poetic by nature and represented romanticism in its purest and healthiest aspect, although by principals, he stood furthest from the school. This poetic nature naturally attracted Eichendorff whose poetry can be very well compared with that of Arnim. Over the poetry of both lay an unreal atmosphere, as if it belonged to another world, the beauties of which both poets spent their lives in pointing out. Eichendorff himself admired Arnim personally much more than he did Brentano. Arnim's chief mission was:

"die Poesie von dem Schulbanne einiger veralteten Männer, die ihre Jugend vergessen hatten, zu befreien, mit Ausschluss aller Tagesneuigkeit wollte er das Künftige der Geschichte in den Strebungen der verschiedensten Art kennen lernen und vorlegen, p. 422 und die Zeit endlich wieder hinführen zu einer gemeinschaftlichen Jugend und Wahrheit, die war Andacht und Religion nennen. Die Art und Weise, wie dieser Kampf dort geführt wird, ist für die Romantik, wie für Arnim bezeichnend."

The most important element of his poetry is its ethical strength, shown in various ways, above all:

i) "als keusche Scheu vor aller Affektation, die selbst jeden konventionellen Schmuck der Poesie spröde verschmäht."

ii) "als eine unwandelbare Gerechtigkeit der Weltanschauung, die .... fest und unverzagt auf den Grund und die natürliche Figuration der Dinge sieht".

The chief importance for Eichendorff lies in the following fact:

"Eben dieses Historisches aber, diese grossartige Gerechtigkeit seiner Poesie, verbunden mit der ihm angeboren Milde, bedingt zugleich sein Verhältnis zur Kirche, und erklärt die merkwürdige Erscheinung, dass seine Dichtungen, obgleich er Protestant war und blieb, dennoch wesentlich katholisch sind."

The reason why Arnim is misunderstood and neglected, is that his whole nature was too much above the comprehension of the ordinary crowd. His mission lay in pointing out Paradise and the wonders of this world to those who did as much as climb up to his height, but need not have led to the misinterpretation of the nature of his poetry, which was common in and after his lifetime.

"Aber was wäre denn die Poesie, wenn nicht eben erfrischende Anregung und Erweckung? Kein Dichter gibt einen fertigen Himmel, er stellt nur die Himmelsleiter auf von der schönen Erde."

The poet whose name is coupled with Arnim is Brentano and the chief characteristic by which he will be remembered is above all fancy.

"Den lebhafteren Brentano riss eine übermächtige Phantasie beständig hin, die Poesie ins Leben zu mischen ..... Der Grundton war eigentlich eine tiefe, fast weiche Sentimentalität, die er aber gründlich verachtete, eine eingeborene Genialität, die er selbst keineswegs respektierte."

Indeed, Brentano had so much genius in this way, that it caused his downfall, for it possessed him to the extent, that he even hated it:

"..... er das Dämonische in ihm nicht etwa, wie so viele Andere, beschönigend als geniale Tugend nahm oder künstlerisch zu vergeistigen suchte, sondern beständig, wie ein heidnisches Datum gehasst hat".
This feeling had of course its influence upon his work, which he treated "ironically".

".... aber seine Ironie ist keine sich selbst genügende, "ästetische aufgebaute Kunst, sondern eine aus innigster Entrüstung hervorbrechende moralische Kraft, um das Schlechte und Gemeine im Leben zu vernichten."

The work done by Arnim and Brentano together was:

"die Schule, die Schon damals in Überkünstlichen Formen üppig zu luxurieren anfing, auf die ursprüngliche Reinheit und Einfachheit des Naturlauts zurückzuweisen. In diesem Sinne sammelten sie selbst auf ihren Fahrten und durch gleich gestimmte Studenten überall die halbverschollenen Volkslieder für: "des Knaben Wunderhorn", das, wie einst Herder's "Stimmen der Völker", durch ganz Deutschland einen erfrischenden Klang gab."

The reason why Eichendorff gave Arnim and Brentano such an important place amongst the Romanticists is that he was their personal friend. Today they are chiefly known as the collectors of the ballads, which they published in "Des Knaben Wunderhorn."

There were many other romanticists or followers of the Romanticists, but Eichendorff's criticism of them is unimportant, as they had little in common with him and so did not influence his ideas. A few names deserve mentioning:
According to Wackenroder:
"die katholische Religion ist der .... eigentliche Boden und Mittelpunkt aller Kunst", and even this fact led him on the wrong path:

"Eben so gewiss musste auch die Einseitigkeit, womit Wackenroder Natur und Kunst, oder mit anderen Worten: das Gefühl als den sichersten, unmittelbarsten, ja einzigen Weg zur Erfassung der göttlichen Dinge überhaupt aufgestellt, und so Kunst und Religion gewissermassen identifiziert hat, zu einem bodenlosen Verhimmeln des Positiven führen und manche schwachen Gemüter verwirren .... Reicht aber das bloße, wandelbare Gefühl, das ja überall erst durch seinen Inhalt und die Überzeugungen Wert und Halt empfängt, nicht einmal zu einer lebendigen Erfassung der Kunst hin wie sollte es der Religion gegenüber genügen?"

This had consequences, which were far-reaching, forming some of the causes of the decline of Romanticism.

"Jenes Missverständnis hat daher, so auch ein dilettantisches Katholischen in Mode gesetzt, das die Kirche fast nur als eine grandiose Kunstausstellung betrachtete."

As it is obvious Eichendorff had no particular admiration for Wackenroder, not recognising in him one of the most important forerunners, if not leaders, of the School.
It is important to notice the name of Löben, since critics, chiefly Pissin, have asserted that Eichendorff was greatly influenced by him. If we read what Eichendorff says about Löben's poetry, we must acknowledge, that if Eichendorff stood under Löben's influence for a time - which was natural - considering that they were students together - the influence was not lasting, for Löben was the direct opposite to Eichendorff.

"Allein sie (die Romantik) hatte auch damals schon ihren sehr bedenklichen Afterkultus. Graf von Löben war in Heidelberg der Hohepriester dieser Winkelkirche. Und in der Tat, er besass eine ganz unglaubliche Formengewandtheit und alles äussere Rüst/zeug des Dichters, aber nicht die Kraft, es gehorig zu brauchen und zu schwingen. Er hatte ein durchaus weibliches Gemüt mit unendlich feinem Gefühl für den salomonmassigen Anstand der Poesie, eine überzarte empfängliche Weichheit, die nichts Schönes selbständig gestaltete, sondern von allen Schönen wechselnd umgestaltet wurde."

Eichendorff had no praise for Fouqué, even although he conformed to every demand of the school. This fact is peculiar, since in his letters to Fouqué, Eichendorff acknowledges himself to be under his influence.

"... die Verherrlichung des Mittelalters zur Kräftigung der Gegenwart, die Wiederbelebung altertümlicher und ausländischer Formen, die religiöse Weltanschauung — und die Poesie selbst war ihm immerdar eine geheimnisvolle Gaben von oben."

"hat grade Fouqué am meisten dazu beigetragen, die Romantik in Missachtung, ja Verachtung zu bringen."

"Bei Fouqué erblicken wir den Katholizismus schon als bloße Decoration und Verschnörkelung eines größtenteils gemachten Rittertums."

It is interesting to notice, now that Kleist has a recognised position amongst the dramatists (following in this way the general opinion of the times) that Eichendorff had no sympathy at all for him.

In Kleist he saw:

"ein grosses Talent sich zwischen Hochmut und Verzweiflung an den unglücklichen Geschicke seines Vaterlandes krankhaft zu Tode arbeiten, weil er den Glaubensmut nicht mehr hatte, die Welt und ihre Erscheinungen, wie die Romantik allerdings verlangte, nur an dem Höchsten zu messen. Diese Herrissenheit blickt dümper und drohend aus seinem Leben sowohl, als aus seinen Dichtungen."
"Und so sehen wir denn bei Kleist schon alle unheilvollen Elemente der neuesten Literatur fast spukhaft auftauchen."

and the reason is:

"weil ihm die höchste Kraft fehlt, das unsichtbare Banner der Poesie kühnglaubig über die irdischen Dinge auf jene stille Höhe zu pflanzen, wo Alles verschont wird."

We have already seen what influence Görres exercised upon the younger Romanticists, above all upon Eichendorff. It only remains to say that his influence rested on his personality:

"die das Grundprinzip der Romantiker, die Vermittlung aller höheren Geisteskräfte mit der Kirche, in sich selbst darstellt."

Eichendorff's ideas on the philosophers Kant, Fichte and Schelling have already been treated.
FAILURES & SUCCESSES OF ROMANTICISM:

Reasons of failure

We have already seen, that the germs of the decline of Romanticism lay in the attitude of each Romanticist towards the different parts and characteristics of the movement. How, for example, romantic irony arose out of individualism, how the conception of philosophical ideas led to the deification of mankind, how religion and above all Roman Catholicism became merely the fashion and not an affair of conviction, how the conception of nature, especially that peculiar to Novalis, degenerated into Pantheism, and lastly how poets thought more of the outward form than of the subject in question or the feelings which dictated the poetry.

It only remains to note the facts, which produced the final impulses to the decline of an already failing school.

1) As it is obvious from consideration of the different characteristics, inward dissension amongst the members was present even from the very first.

As a school, the romanticists had their intentions, which were praiseworthy, but it was just in those very intentions, that they failed.

"So war die Romantik, bei ihrem Aufgange ein Frühlingshauch, der alle verborgenen Keime belebte, eine schöne Zeit des Erwachens, der Erwartung und Verheissung. Allein sie hatt die Verheissung nicht erfüllt, und weil sie sie nicht erfüllte, ging sie unter."

"Nicht in ihren Intentionenlag der Fall der romantischen Poesie, sondern in ihrem eigenen Abfall von jenen Intentionen."

Only one side of the mission was emphasized - the "ästetische."

"Was die Romantik unternommen, konnte nur aus dem innersten Marke der Gesinnung, aus der tiefsten Wurzel des religiösen Lebens heraufgebaut werden: ihre Aufgabe war halb eine etische, die romantischen Poeten aber nahmen sie blossästetisch."

Here Eichendorff as always, lays stress upon the fact, that the Romanticists failed to carry out the ethical mission of the school. We can question, if some of them ever recognised that there was an ethical side to it. Romanticism contained a distinct tendency towards Roman Catholicism, but it was certainly not one of the chief missions, although no one can question the fact, that it was one of the reasons of the decline of the school.

iii) As it always happens, after a literary period of strongly marked tendencies, a re-action set in, which gave the school its final death blow.

"Und so entspann sich unter der jüngern Generation, erst heimlich intriguirend, dann immer und tumult-uarischer, zur Wahrung der unveräußerlichen Menschenrechte, eine allgemeine Rebellion gegen das romantische Wesen."

"Einen andern Teil der Reaction gegen die Romantiker und mit nicht geringerem Erfolge, hat neuerdings die Salonpoesie der Frauen übernommen."

THE GOOD WORK OF THE ROMANTICISTS:

Such an important and extensive movement cannot help producing at least some good and lasting work, which will last longer than any memory of its shortcomings. It was quite easy to observe in what way they did good work, as we proceeded to examine each separate part, and it only remains to sum up the whole in a few words.

Without exaggeration, the romanticists opened up new and unheard of provinces of thought, every province receiving a new impulse and some a new life, — but above all that of poetry in general.

"Man musste .... die Kirche entgegensetzen. Das Alles tat, oder versuchte vielmehr die Romantik, und zwar vorzugsweise durch das Medium der Poesie. Jene höchste Vermittlung erstrbte Novalis in seinem "Heinrich von Oftendingen" ganz speciell für die Dichtkunst."

" .... haben die Romantiker für die Dichtkunst sehr viel gewirkt."

"Das deutsche Volkslied .... von Görres, Arnim, und Brentano wieder national gemacht."

"Von Grund aus verjüngt aber wurde insbesondere die Poesie, und gewann einen überraschenden Reichtum an Inhalt und Formen."
There was also lasting work done with regard to research into foreign languages and literatures, also into the realms of history and philosophy, but above all by Fr. Schlegel.

"wobei wir nur Fr. Schlegel und Görres ausnehmen, deren eigentliche Macht aber weniger auf dem Gebiete der Poesie, als auf dem der Kritik, der Geschichte und Philosophie liegt."

A special feature of this literary activity is the translations especially those of Shakespeare and Calderon.

"In diesem Sinne haben ihre noch unübertroffenen Übersetzungen einen entscheidenden Einfluss auf unsere Literatur ausgeübt, Calderon wurde von ihnen gleichsam erst entdeckt. Auch Shakespeare war bis dahin fast nur eine Geheimwissenschaft der Goethe’schen Jugendgenossen."

With regard to Eichendorff’s criticism of the failure and success of the school, it is astonishing to find how clear sighted he was - considering he was a pronounced Romanticist - with regard to the reasons, for with the trifling exception of the weight which he laid upon the religious side of it, the same views upon the subject are held to-day.

On looking back on the three points, wherein they succeeded, nobody could deny, that it is a work of which any school can be proud, for not only will the usefulness of of these translations etc. be felt far and wide, but also the influence of the school itself will reach even to the smallest thinker of future centuries.
EICHENDORFF & ROMANTICISM.

RESUME.
We have already taken into consideration Eichendorff's views on each separate part and characteristic of Romanticism, so that it only remains for us to sum up these ideas by finding the most important elements common to them all, with remarks as to any particular effects. The strongest element, which penetrates his ideas on every subject is the religious, for it was that element which lay at the foundation of his romanticism, since the movement attracted him above all because it led men to study the literature of the Middle Ages, instead of the old classical mythology, which seemed to him heathenish, and because it set up feeling as the governor of our thoughts, in the place of reason, to which nothing is sacred.

This religious element is found already in the cause of the movement as a reaction upon the spirit of "die Aufklärung", which was the characteristic of the 18th century. It is also a part of his definition of Romanticism, as a peculiarity of the Christian peoples. Lastly, it lies in the chief mission of the school, which was to bring back to the old Church, those who had fallen away; the failure to carry out this mission was the chief cause of the decline of the School.

This earnest conviction could not but have the greatest effect upon his ideas in particular. Indeed, it was the underlying factor of each thought and criticism. For example, he was always very serious in his attitude to poetry, considering it a Divine gift, of
It is obvious that Eichendorff had by no means a philosophical mind, and indeed he had a great contempt for philosophy, as considered by itself. This is the cause of his misunderstanding of Kant. He only saw his ruling quality of questioning everything, which quality impelled him to investigate into every realm of thought, even those which before had been sacred by tradition, not recognizing the fact that Kant's work lay in destroying, in his search for truth, the old prejudices and superstitions, which were so general a few centuries ago, and in causing men to consider what they really did believe and know.

The love which Eichendorff bore to Nature was another phase of his religious element. He looked upon Nature as the work, hence the servant of Divinity, so that it must be regarded with veneration almost, and the sympathy for it heightened on remembering its close connection with humanity. It was on account of this, that he was so severe against the pantheistic tendency in Romanticism, which ended to look upon nature as Divinity itself. This religious element was also the connecting link between nature and symbolism, which fact is illustrated by what we have said above, nature being a symbol of what is divine and eternal.

Lastly the religious faith was what Eichendorff always looked or first of all in his criticism of other writers, and if it was not there, place amongst the foremost poets was not granted. This is the reason why he did not allow Goethe to be one of the masters of Romanticism, although he did not hesitate to acknowledge Goethe's worth as a poet and as the author of "Wilhelm Meister". He was even harder with regard to Rousseau, who, in his words, maintained that the individual should develop and then make his own religion according to his nature.

The second most important element, which had its root in the first, is the poetic, since it is only by longing for higher things, that we can realise the nature of poetry; this element runs parallel with the religious. Like the first element, this one is also found in the cause of the movement, for it is natural that poetry should not exist during that period when reason is ruler, but should wait to burst forth as soon as the required impulses are present. These impulses were found at the beginning of the 19th Century, on account of the fitness of the characteristics of the times and on account of the new literary activity which had set in. The element is also found in the definition, since it was by means of poetry that the romantic spirit with its aims and aspirations was given expression. The mission of the school was poetic, whilst it undertook the regeneration of the whole province of poetry, this mission being the one which the Romanticists fulfilled above all others.

This element also affected his views on the different divisions of Romanticism, since it was always for the poetic and the picturesque, that he sought. This is one of the reasons for his dislike of Philosophy, since it deals with reason and only founds a set of rules, having no sense for art or poetry. That one could be a philosopher in the wide sense of the term, and also a poet like the French De Vigny never occurred to Eichendorff.

This poetic element had its root in the religious one, but it also influenced his attitude towards his faith. For example, his poetic soul was greatly attracted by the outward beauty and the systicism of the Roman Catholic Church, and the two elements - religion and poetic - together, furthered his leaning towards symbolism although his symbolism never became so complicated as that of some of the other writers. We cannot lay too much stress upon this fact, as it shows the connection between his attitude towards religion and towards Romanticism, since otherwise his ideas upon religion would seem to have no place in this subject. It was the same with his attitude towards Protestantism, in which he only saw a negative, calculating spirit, distinctly prosaic and therefore with no sense or poetry.

Eichendorff was a poet of nature, both with regard to his ideas in the subject and his application of them, and as such, his mission as to find out all that was poetic in nature, in order to reveal its mysterious connection with human life. Hence there must be nothing artificial or conventional about Nature; it must be represented as it is, and has been for countless ages, around mankind whom it sympathises. Thus only a poet is capable of even seeing all this.

The poetic element was always the second, for which Eichendorff looked in other writers, and any one who had neither a religious nor apoetic sense fared badly in his criticism. Although Eichendorff criticised Goethe on account of his pantheistic tendency, yet he could not question his poetic talent. But in the case of Kant, one of his arguments against him and his teaching was his lack of poetic feeling.

In conclusion, it must be remarked that the religious element is not so noticeable in other members, as in Eichendorff. They all, without exception, recognised the significance of the School with regard to poetry, but most of them only considered that Romanticism was a cultivation of the feelings, the feeling for religion being merely a part of what was to be cultivated, without any special regard for the mission of Romanticism in that respect.

CRITICISMS AGAINST EICHENORFF'S IDEAS.

Before leaving the subject of Eichendorff's ideas on Romanticism, we must take into account that various criticisms could be made against them by anyone, who is considering the question. It is only necessary to take the few which seem most apparent.

1. That he criticised his own school.

This is quite true, for, as we shall see, he did belong to the Romanticists, although some critics have since tried to dispute the fact. Not only was he a Romanticist by nature, but also he knew most of the other Romanticists personally, those belonging to the elder school, as well as those belonging to the younger; thus his ideas were naturally influenced by their teaching. Moreover, being on intimate terms with such men as Fr. Schlegel, Arnim and Brentano, as well as Görres, it is not likely that he would criticise them harshly. This is apparent in his critical works, for he has only good words to say about those men, seeing no faults in them. Thus on some occasions, he had not sufficient insight; and this fact is true, not only with regard to his friends, but also with regard to some whom he did not know quite so well. For example, in the case of Kleist, a man worthy of the name of critic, would have recognized the fact, that Kleist possessed remarkable dramatic powers, and that his works will probably last longer than most of the literary work of the Romanticists. But Eichendorff only uttered the sentiments of the time in condemning him. The criticism is also true with regard to his ideas on the various parts of literature since he criticised each part from a Romantic point of view, without sufficient insight to detect the good and lasting work done by other schools, such as the classic School of Schiller and Goethe.

On the other hand, it must be noticed, that Eichendorff wrote his critical works in later life, after he had given up writing stori and lyrics, and when the enthusiasm for Romanticism had had time to cool a little, giving place to a religious zeal, which became more and more evident as he advanced in life. Therefore he would be better fitted in later life to criticise the School, than he was in his youth. It must be evident also, on examining his ideas on Romanticism, how clearly he sees the reasons of the failure of the School, what special faults the leaders had, with the important result upon their works and also the good work, which was done by each member.

2. That he was too subjective.

This is quite true, and the results which this fact had upon his criticism, are quite obvious: he advocated his own views and could only see his own side of the question. Examples of this in his critical works are everywhere apparent, as in his criticism of Rückert, he applied the fact that cleverness in fashioning a beautiful outward form was one of the causes of the decline of Romanticism, thus placing Rückert amongst the mere imitators and followers of the School, without any praise for the beautiful outward form itself. This fact was also the cause of his laying such emphasis upon the religious side of the school, for, as we have pointed out, he wrote his critical works, when the importance of poetry had become only a secondary matter to him.

At the same time, we must acknowledge that his views generally coincided with what was best in the Romantic School, and also, that if the other Romanticists had kept their ideas so fresh, and their ideals so high, their work would not have degenerated as it did.

3. That he was narrow minded on the subject of Religion.

This criticism is perhaps more obvious and has more adverse results than the other two. All through his works, he advocated Roman Catholicism and tried to show that the beauties which poets sought in Romanticism were to be found in the old Church. He always complained of the fact that there were no Roman Catholic poets worth mentioning, without acknowledging that the submissive, unquestioning spirit, which Roman Catholicism cultivates and even demands, is not likely to produce a poet, who must above all long for something and suffer on that account, very often rebelling at the surrounding conditions, before he can attain the heights, to reach which he has striven for so long. As a balance against the Crusade in the cause of Roman Catholicism, was his misinterpretation of Protestantism. He did not see that both are necessary, since Protestantism often clears out the prejudices and ignorance, which are the inevitable results of unquestioning submission, and that it is just the longing, rebelling spirit which must produce the poet.

This charge is perhaps harder to defend than the others, and for that end, we must turn to his private life, where he was not so narrow minded as it appears from his works. As a striking proof of this, he never hesitated to make friends with anyone who was a Protestant, as Schön for example, who was not only a Protestant, but also an enthusiastic follower of Kant. This friendship was not merely fleeting, but lasted until Schön died.

EICHENDORFF'S LITERARY WORK.

We have only taken note of Eichendorff's novels and lyrics, when there has been something peculiar in the application of his ideas, and as the criticism of his literary works in detail does not lie within our subject, it is only necessary to find out the most striking elements with any particular effects which they have upon his works, comparing them generally with his criticism works. Eichendorff's fame rests chiefly on his lyrics, and on the novels: "Ahnung und Gegenwart", "Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts", "Das Karmorbild", and "Das Schloss Dürande". He has also written several other short stories, which are only feeble imitations of his other works, or modelled on Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister", but as they add nothing to his reputation, we will not discuss them here.

The most striking element in his works is subjectivism. In the same way as in his critical works, he advocates his own views, and indeed we might even say, that his literary works, above all, "Ahnung und Gegenwart", are the illustration of his ideas. There are even passages in his literary works, which exactly correspond to passages in his critical works.

For example:

"Denn kein Dichter gibt einen fertigen Himmel; er stellt nur die Himmelsleiter auf von der schönen Erde."

Another result of this subjectivism is that all his literary works, like those of the other Romanticists, are more or less autobiographic, and again we can quote the name of "Ahnung und Gegenwart", as the best example. All his heroes have his characteristics or are portraits of some of his friends, as he interpreted them, with a few of his own characteristics added. As for example, Viktor represents Külpke, the old family chaplain and tutor; Leontin represents Brentano. It has been the work of several critics to try to find out the identities of his other heroes, and above all of his heroines, most of whom, such as Rosa, are taken from life, or out of other books, Erwin being without doubt, as Goethe's Mignon. This extreme subjectivism was also the cause of his inability to understand and to portray characters, opposite to his own such as Mephistopheles or Shylock, the delineation of a marked character such as these not lying in his power; in fact there are very few of his characters, which have even an individuality of their own.

The element in Eichendorff's literary works, which gives him a title to that fame he enjoys, and which also causes him to stand apart unrivalled even amongst the other German poets, is lyricism. In itself, it is a result of his subjectivism, since it is only in a lyrical manner that a poet can express his own ideas, aspirations and feelings. This element is found in both his literary and his critical works. Anyone who has read his "Geschichte der poetischen Literatur Deutschlands", will have noticed his poetical, even lyrical method of expression, which lends such a picturesque note to it, especially when he deals with the early times. To attain this lyrical effect, his chief regard was naturally beauty, especially outward beauty; everything must attract and must be represented so as to appeal to everyone of us. It is on account of the simplicity and and naturalness of his expression, by means of which he strove to reach his aim, that many of Eichendorff's lyrics have become so popular and are counted amongst the German folksongs, as for example "In einem Kühlen Grunde". In his literary works, which have all a lyrical nature, everything is descriptive rather than analytic, and we can quote as an example of this, a passage which describes the entry of the hero of "Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts", into the goal of all Romanticists - Rome.

Ich kam nur zuerst auf eine grosse, einsame Heide, auf der es so grau und still war wie im Grabe. Nur hin und her stand ein altes, verfallenes Gemäuer oder ein trockener, wunderbar gewundener Strauch; manchmal schwirrten Nachtvögel durch die Luft, und mein eigener Schatten strich immer fort lang und dunkel in der Einsamkeit neben mir her. Sie sagen, dass hier eine uralte Stadt und die Frau Venus begraben liegt, und die alten Heiden zuweilen noch aus ihren Gräbern heraufsteigen und bei stiller Nacht über die Heide gehen und die Wanderer verwirren. Aber ich ging immer gerade fort und liess mich nichts ansehchen. Denn die Stadt stieg immer deutlicher und prachtiger vor mir herauf, und die hohen Burgen und Tore und goldenen Kuppeln glänzten so herrlich als standen wirklich die Engel in goldenen Gewändern im hellen Mondsschein, auf den Zinnen und sängen durch die stille Nacht herüber."

In this quotation we have the usual motifs of Eichendorff: hills, mountains and woods, moonshine and a general air of mystery arising from the buried town; in addition, similes scattered here and there. Almost always, and especially in "Ahnung und Gegenwart", we get, as in the passage quoted, a series of pictures, most of which have only existed in the poet's brain, portraying nature and men, with their different moods. There is very little real action in the novel, the characters merely coming and going, without any apparent cause or result, so that we can open the book almost at any place and read just as much as we like. Indeed, we have the feeling that Eichendorff himself only ended the book because he thought fit, and that he could have written much more in the same strain. In the same way, he relates what his heroes do more than what they think, never developing a character or analysing the thoughts of any individual; this fact is also illustrated by the passage quoted above. A characteristic of all Eichendorff's stories, which heightens the lyrical effect, is the presence of the many beautiful songs which are scattered here and there, which different individuals sing at the slightest provocation.

We have already made sufficient remarks about the religious element, which pervades all his works, literary and critical, so that it only remains to notice the effects which it had upon his characters. Since all his heroes represent phases of himself, and he himself was always taken care of, therefore they too were in the end also taken care of. Indeed, it is surprising how good most of his heroes are, for they never doubt or rebel, but take everything as it comes, with the conviction that something will turn up in the end. This characteristic is betrayed in such sentences as:

"Das Unternehmen war gefährlich und gewagt, doch nahmen sie sehr vergnügt, Abschied von einander".

"Friedrich fühlte diesen gewitternden Druck der Luft und waffnete sich nur desto frömmier mit jenem Ernst und Mute, den ein grosser Zweck der Sicht gibt. Er warf sich mit doppeltem Eifer wieder auf seine Studien, sein ganzes Sinnen und Trachten war endlich auf sein Vaterland gerichtet".

REASONS OF FAILURE.

In our consideration of the reasons of Eichendorff's failure, it seems most natural to treat of them from the point of view of his novels, as we have already dealt with the criticisms, which can be made against his ideas, and to take above all "Ahnung und Gegenwart", as our example, since that novel contains all the characteristics of which we shall speak.

The failing which draws our attention first on reading "Ahnung und Gegenwart", is that, as in the works of most of the other Romanticists, there is an excess of just those qualities which he himself advocated; the qualities in this case being beauty and poetry. In other words, the work is too Romantic, taking it from Eichendorff's own point of view. This excess of beauty and poetry is shown in every way. In the plan of the novel everything happens as it should happen and at the most convenient time; nothing disagreeable or disastrous happens to the personages; nothing prosaic mars the steady flow of beauty and poetry from the first to the last chapter of the book. Also in his descriptions of nature, he did not depart from this rule, for nature is always fair and smiling; even when there is a thunderstorm, there are always beautiful effects; his castles and mills are always situated in the most beautiful spots, generally in the very wilds of Nature itself. It is the same also in his descriptions or rather delineations of characters, for everyone of his heroes are wonderfully beautiful and attractive in character; nobody ugly or repellent finds much sympathy at his hands. In thus carrying out his aim, of making his works as poetical and as beautiful as possible, Eichendorff forgot that the chief element in the novel, as he himself maintained, ought to be reason, with the result that if there had been more reason in his work, it would have been more successful.

This excess of beauty had a result, which is in itself a cause of his failure: his works are too far from reality. In this respect, "Ahnung und Gegenwart" does not attain its end of representing the period in which the poet wrote it, or in other words, reality, for after reading the book, we are liable to ask ourselves: what is the moral of the work? What new thoughts have we? How much better off are we after reading it? And to the first of these questions we must answer, - at the same time remembering that Eichendorff himself maintained, that novels with a moral and no other purpose are useless, - that we can find no moral for practical purposes, since the heroes are really no different inwardly in the end from what they were in the beginning; they have merely undergone a series of adventures which have touched them lightly, without producing any great climax in their lives, and in this way the work is unreal.
This fact is important, since the second of Eichendorff's aims in this work was to develop the character of Friedrich. To the second of these questions we must answer that we have no new thought in fact the work has not made us think at all; it has merely appealed to our feelings, by requiring sympathy, admiration, astonishment or fear as the case may be. This failure depends on the first, for if Eichendorff had treated any character psychologically, showing the effects, which the period and also the more immediate surroundings, had upon the hero, we should certainly have had some new thoughts. Had this been so, the work would have been more consistent with reality, for the study of any character will cause thought. Lastly, to the third of these questions we must answer, that we are no better off after reading the novel, for the poet has taken us away from reality, but in return, he has given us nothing for it, not even making us convinced about the world, which he himself has created, for everything in connection with the novel, whether nature or man, has a dreamlike atmosphere, which gives us a dissatisfied feeling of something being lacking in it.

We have treated the subject that Eichendorff in "Ahnung und Gegenwart" failed to carry out his aims of representing the period in which he wrote, and of representing the inward development of the hero Friedrich, and what we have said generally with regard to his failure in the portrayal of character on account of the excess of beauty and poetry and also on account of the lack of reality in the delineation can be also applied to this particular case. So that the reasons of Eichendorff's failure with regard to the novel are mainly caused by his failure to carry out his two main objects. In reality, the work is autobiographic, the form being a convenient one in which he could portray various events and people, who had entered into his own life.

In conclusion we may say that the tests, which we have applied to the novel "Ahnung und Gegenwart" can be applied to all his works with more or less of the same results. Hence he failed on account of the excess of beauty and poetry and also on account of the lack of reality in his works, both of which facts have particular results, which are in themselves minor reasons of failure.

WHEREIN HE SUCCEEDED.

It is easier to find out exactly the reasons of Eichendorff's success, after we have become quite clear as to the reasons of his failure, for that he did succeed and in some respects, is even now unrivalled, cannot be doubted. His most successful works and those which will be read by posterity are chiefly his lyrics and then in a secondary place, his three stories, "Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts", "Das Marmorbild", and "Das Schloss Durande". Since we have dealt with his critical works in detail, it is only necessary to say here that, although they are interesting in themselves, they are not read by posterity on account of those criticisms which we have discussed. Therefore, if we do not call those works successful, which are not read by posterity, we cannot add his critical works to the list of his successes.
The first point to notice, with regard to his success, but above all in his lyrics, is the spirit of the folksong, which pervades his works. In this respect he could only have been a Romanticist and a German. Thus his lyrics contain those qualities which are peculiar to the Germanic races. Let us take as an illustration of this the following well known lyric, which was originally placed in "Ahnung und Gegenwart":

DAS ZERBROCHENE RINGLEIN.

In einem kühlen Grunde
Da geht ein Mühlentad,
Mein Liebste ist verschwunden,
Die dort gewohnet hat.

Sie hat mir Treu' versprochen,
Gab mir ein'n Ring dabei,
Sie hat die Treu' gebrochen,
Mein Ringlein sprang entzwei.

Ich möcht' als Spielmann reisen,
Weit in die Welt hinaus,
Und singen meine Weisen,
Und gehn von Haus zu Haus.

Ich möcht als Reiter fliegeh,
Wohl in die blut'ge Schlacht,
Um stille Feuer liegen,
Im Feld bei dunkler Nacht.
Hör ich das Mührlad gehen
Ich weiss nichts was ich will Ich mücht am liebsten sterben, Da wür's auf einmal still

In this we find all the characteristics peculiar to Eichendorff, such as the description of nature, closely connected with some human sentiment, the whole enveloped by an air of mystery even to the point of tragedy; all these characteristics are found in the German folksong, a fact which is important, is that Eichendorff in this respect carried out exactly what Arnim and Brentano advocated, the spirit of many of his songs resembling that of the songs contained in the collection: "Des Knaben Wunderhorn". In fact, as a lyricist, Eichendorff is unrivalled, even amongst the Germans - the race of lyricists. Not even excluding Goethe, for if we compare the lyrics of Eichendorff with the lyrics of Goethe, we shall find that Goethe's lyrics are not so simple, so natural, and so free from the influence of learning, as Eichendorff's are.

In all his literary works, it is noticeable that Eichendorff had few ideas and few motifs, so that the same ideas, such as the sympathy of nature for mankind, and the same motifs, such as wandering knights and poets, ruined castles and deserted mills, appear again and again in different parts of Europe in Italy and in Spain as well as in Germany, with only a few differences. But where his originality lay, was in the method of treatment, and no one can deny that the dreamlike lyrical atmosphere, which lies over his works has a charm of its own and also that the treatment is peculiar to Eichendorff. This originality is especially true with regard to his treatment of Nature, for no poet is so capable as Eichendorff, of portraying Nature with its different moods, especially that peculiar to spring, and the mysterious connections and sympathy, which exist between mankind and nature. Examples of this can be taken at random, such as:

Frühlingsdämmerung.

In der stillen Pracht
In allen frischen Büschen und Bäumen Flüstert's wie Träumen Die ganze Nacht.
Denn über den mondbeglänzten Ländern
Mit langen weissen Gewändern
Ziehen die schlanken Wolkengrau'n wie geheime Gedanken, Senden von den Felsenwänden
Hinab die behenden
Frühlingsgesellen, die heilen Waldquellen, Die's unten bestellen
An die duft'gen Tiefen,
Die gerne noch schliefen,
Nun wiegen und neigen in ahnendem Schweigen,
Sich alle so eigen
Mit Ahren und Zweigen, Erzählen's den Winden,
Die durch die blühenden Linden
Vorüber den grasenden Rehen Säuselnd über die Seen gehen,
Dass die Nipfen verschlafen auftauchen
Und fragen,
Was sie so lieblich hauchen - Wer mag es wohl sagen?

In this poem we observe the mysterious preparations made by nature for the coming of spring, the effect of it being heightened by the form of the verse.

Der stille Grund.

Der Mondenschein verwirret
Die Wälder weit und breit,
Die Bächlein, wie verirret,
Kahn durch die Einsamkeit,

Da drüben sah ich stehen
Den Wald auf steiler Höhe!
Die dunklen Tannen sehen
In einen tiefen See.

Ein‘n Kahn wohl sah ich ragen,
Doch niemand, der ihn lenkt,
Das Ruder war zerschlagen,
Das Schifflein halb versenkt.
Ein' Nixe auf dem Steine Flocht dort ihr goldnes Haar.
Sie meint', sie war alleine
Und sang so wunderbar.

Sie sang und sang, in den Bäumen
Und Quellen rauscht' es sacht
Und flüsterte wie in Träumen Die mond/beglänzte Nacht.

Ich aber stand erschrocken,
Denn über Wald und Kluft
Erklangen Morgenglocken
Schon ferne durch die Luft.

Und hätt' ich nicht vernommen
Den Klang zu guter Stund!
Wär' nimmermehr gekommen
Aus diesem stillen Grund.

In this poem we must observe that nature' by her gloomy foreboding sympathises with the poet, over whom a spell is cast by the song of the elf, the spell only being broken by the sound of the bells, in themselves a sign of the presence of humanity.

A characteristic, which Mickendorff possessed in common with most of the Romanticists, is that he was no mere imitator, but developed according to his nature, absorbing just those ideas, which seemed fit, and in this way, carrying out exactly the view which he expressed on individualism. Perhaps one cause of this may be, that he never cared about fame and fashion, but sang as a true poet should, when he found he must, giving expression to those thoughts and feelings which occupied him at the time. This had inevitable results upon his works, all of which give us the feeling that he was sincere and earnest in what he wrote, and that in portraying nature and feelings as he did, he gave us exactly what he himself had seen and experienced. As an illustration of this we need only read the poem which he composed on the death of his child: "Das Kindlein spielt draussen im Frühlingsschein." (p.239)

As a concluding remark, a characteristic which throws fresh light upon the reasons of his success, and which may be already obvious, is that his work is entirely free from those elements, which can be called decadent in the Romantic School, his failure lying in the fact that he carried out his views on Romanticism only too well in most points, and not in the fact that he allowed any particular characteristic to develop, so that it possessed him entirely as in the cases of Novalis and Tieck. Above all he kept his characteristics from first to last, free from any degenerating tendency.
EICHENDORFF'S place in the SCHOOL of the ROMANTICISTS:

The question naturally arises as part of our consideration of Eichendorff and Romanticism, as to what place he is entitled to hold in that school. A good many critics, such as Haym, assert that only the elders are entitled to the name, and so exclude him altogether; others, such as Ricarda Huch, assert that he only belongs to that period, which includes the decline of Romanticism. If we consider the Romanticists as belonging to one School, and ask ourselves what a school means in this particular case, we shall find that it embraces all those writers belonging to that period, who made a literary record of their experiences within the circle of their emotional inner life.

Further, it seems natural to divide the school into two groups, the elder and the younger, since the younger followed the elder from the point of view of time, and also since the elder introduced the new ideas in most cases, while the younger generally applied them. Besides that, all the romanticists were acquainted at least with the works, if not personally with most of the others, so that they naturally influenced each other's ideas. Thus the conclusion is, that the school should be extended as widely as possible, excluding no one to whom the definition is applicable.

The leaders themselves lent support to this definition by discouraging imitation. Everyone should think for himself and develop his own nature freely, without any special regard for the others. Also they fought for freedom in this respect, asserting that there should be no arbitrary rules, which only restrain thoughts and deeds, each poet should make his own rules and give expression to his thoughts in that way which seems best.

The definition is applicable to Eichendorff, since in all his literary works, he gave a record of his experiences with regard to his inner emotional life, as well as any events which have happened to him.

(We have already taken note of the facts that he was educated in the Romantic atmosphere, that he was Romantic by nature, and lastly, that he fulfilled the demands of the leaders of the School in his works. Hence Eichendorff can in no way be excluded from the School of the Romanticists.

Now we can include Eichendorff in the School of the Romanticists, we must assign him a place amongst the other members, by finding out whether he belongs to the elder or to the younger group. To do this it is best to observe in what points he resembled them, and in what points he differed from them, from a general point of view and to draw the conclusion afterwards.

Wherein he resembled the Romanticists.

The first two points, which are most striking in consideration of this subject, and which brings him nearer to the elder group, are that he was a critic and also a translator, thus fulfilling two demands of the School. We have already dealt with him as a critic; as a translator, he was more indefatigable than it appears, for even when he was at Heidelberg, he translated Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister" into Italian, and later on in life, he occupied much of his time in translating some of Calderon's autos (sacred plays.)

He also carried out in his works, what the leaders required with regard to the ruling quality, which should be feeling, in this way resembling the younger group. Indeed, there seems to have been something southern in his nature in this respect; moreover, we have already noted the fact that in his literary works, he appeals to our emotions rather than gives us food for thought. This is a weightier fact than it seems at first sight, for by it he carried out exactly what has been called the definition of Romanticism - "Seelenkultur".

If we descend to less important details we shall find that Eichendorff in his literary works has characteristics, which are common to all of them. As examples: they all loved what was strange and mysterious; Eichendorff did too. One of the chief characteristics of all of them was longing for something, generally indefinite; it was also one of Eichendorff's leading characteristics. Almost all cultivated symbolism, till it became the cause of their downfall; Eichendorff's work is full of symbols, but the excess of it was not the cause of his failure. Most of them looked for sources in the Middle Ages, and from the Romance literatures; Eichendorff had a particular veneration for the Middle Ages, and founded some of his tales and songs on Italian, Spanish and French histories. Indeed, it is quite striking in how far Eichendorff had the characteristics common to all the other Romanticists when we sum up the facts.

Wherein he differed from the Romanticists.

The points in which he differed from the other Romanticists are above all to be found in his private life, since the reasons for them lie in his nature, which caused that he should bear a certain attitude to Romanticism and treat it in the way he did. Firstly, most of the others did their works and thought out their ideas with the utmost effort, only becoming Romanticists because the movement gave them what they sought. This was especially the case of Fr. Schlegel, who, according to Eichendorff, simply fought his way through the school. On the other hand, Eichendorff was educated in the atmosphere of Romanticism, which fact gave the final impulse to his innate Romantic tendency, and in none of his works can we find even a trace of effort; everything has an easy flowing style, because it was quite natural to him.

Secondly, religion at first had not an important place in the consideration of the other members. But later on, their thoughts had a religious tendency, because religion, and above all, Roman Catholicism, answered to their needs, by cultivating their feelings, but especially by means of symbolism. And finally they became so afraid of their own feelings, that they were very glad even to give up their lordship over them. Another cause of this religious tendency was that a gap had been left in their philosophy.
for they had rebelled against reason, which required proofs, and became as a counter-result more and more convinced of the mysterious workings of fate. This led naturally to a great anxiety as to this fate, so also on that account, they became glad to give up even the last thread of responsibility regarding themselves. The result of these two facts was the inclination towards Roman Catholicism, which was so apparent in most of the members, but above all in those of the younger group. But none of these tendencies had the slightest effect upon Eichendorff, for he was a Roman Catholic by birth and education, and was so convinced about it, that he never fluctuated according to the literary tendencies of the time; besides that, it never even occurred to him to be anxious about his welfare.

Lastly, most of the Romanticists, and this is one of the gravest charges urged against them, were very unsettled in their daily life, perhaps as an indirect result of Fichte's philosophy, which urged subjectivism to such a great extent, that they became almost afraid of that little god within, and it was in trying to still its demands, that they led such a wild, unsettled life. On the other hand, Eichendorff stood furthest from the School in this respect. He was naturally quiet and cautious and repelled by anything, which might have a disagreeable or even an unlooked for consequence. Perhaps the cause of this lay in the different attitudes towards individualism. Most of the Romanticists interpreted individualism as the cultivation of the feelings to the exclusion of anything else, and were annoyed if anything seemed to hinder their efforts in this direction. But Eichendorff interpreted individualism as the free development of the nature of an individual, balanced by quiet religious faith and feeling for duty.

Thus in conclusion we can sum up by saying that Eichendorff had points in common with both the elder and the younger group, the elder in his criticism and translations, the younger in his ruling quality of feeling, but that he belonged to the younger group rather than to the elder, since he applied ideas more than introduced new ones, in this respect fulfilling the demands made by the elder group. Also with regard to time he belongs to the younger group rather than to the elder, since he was a comrade of Armin and Brentano, but was under the influence of the leaders such as the Schlegels. Hence not only was Eichendorff a Romanticist, but he was also a member of the younger group.
